WHOLE No. 263.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF —.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in —.

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSSES.

THIS is the "Week of Prayer." Is it any better than the other fifty-one weeks of the year?

WILL YOU NOT resolve to secure at least one new subscription for THE INDEX before the month expires?

REV. MR. HEPWORTH, of New York, writes on the highest themes. One of his latest is "Church Steeples."

THE official returns show that 40,077 votes were cast in Michigan at the recent election in favor of woman suffrage, and 135,954 against it.

DURING THE YEAR 1873, the United States School Commissioner reports an aggregate of $11,250,000, donated or bequeathed to schools and colleges in this country.

ENOUGH has been said about the "Perfect Horse" to satisfy any one but a jockey. Who will favor us with a treatise on the "Perfect Ass"? Materials for it are abundant.

THE MORAL EDUCATION SOCIETY will meet in the Woman's Club Rooms, No. 3 Tremont Place, Friday, Jan. 8, at 3 o'clock P. M. Essay by A. W. Stevens. Subject, "What is Morality?"

REV. DR. BARTOL will give three lectures, on the 27th of this month, and February 3d and 10th, at 7 1-2 o'clock, P. M., in Bulfinch Street Chapel, on "Shakespeare," "Spiritualism," and "Industrial Education." All proceeds will be devoted to "Poverty studying Divinity."

KING PHILIP THE FAIR, of France, in a quarrel with the Pope, styled him "Your Folly" instead of "Your Holiness." The Nation thinks this "a form which apparently does not lose its use as the ages roll on;" an opinion in which Bismarck and Gladstone would probably agree with it.

WHAT a band of heroes were those Central High School boys who marched, one hundred strong, to the Girls' Lower High School, in New Orleans, and drove out four or five little colored girls who were peaceably studying their lessons! Southern "chivalry" may stick a taller plume than ever in its hat.

SCIENCE is one thing, and "scientists" are another. A great many of the latter deserve better to be called sciolists. The Nation's dread of the "sacerdotal tendency" of popular professors is (strange to say) an amusing deviation in the direction of "sentimentalism." There is not the least danger of a scientific priesthood getting us unawares under its thumb.

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa, is in a ferment over the Sunday question. The stores have been kept open on that day; the mayor has ordered them closed; half the store-keepers have refused to obey, and been arrested; and the foreman of the engine company has issued orders to his men not to turn out to any fire between Saturday midnight and one o'clock Sunday. Whether the "Fire Fiend" will also "keep holy the Sabbath day" remains to be discovered.

EIGHT hundred young girls recently answered an advertisement in Philadelphia calling for two hundred ballet dancers. Most of them had never been on the stage before. What a pitiable state of things is revealed by such a fact! Every girl should be so educated as to be able to earn her living, without submitting to degradation as the only escape from starvation. If the money squandered on foreign missions were appropriated to sensible objects, such scandalous facts could scarcely occur.

HARVARD COLLEGE will require all candidates for admission next July to write a short English composition, correct in spelling, grammar, punctuation, and form of expression. It is astonishing how few persons, even of those considered well educated, understand how to prepare a correct manuscript; yet slovenliness in these respects is like going about with dirty hands, torn clothes, and muddy boots. The best results will follow, if the College examiners (who, it is hoped, will be competent to their task) are strict in their requirements for admission.

MR. FROTHINGHAM's opening lecture in the Horticultural Hall course, in this city, was delivered last Sunday to a house packed to overflowing and (we must add) to suffocation. Hundreds went away, we are told, because they could not get in. The lecture was on "Human Nature," and held the closest attention of that half-stifled multitude to the end; but, thanks to Mr. Frothingham's never-failing kindness to THE INDEX, it will appear in these columns next week and need not be epitomized now. That it was a strong and eloquent address is only a matter of course.

THE CINCINNATI Enquirer intimates that the echoes of the addresses on the question, "Will the Coming Man Attend Church?" made in that city, in 1870, at one of the autumnal conventions of the Free Religious Association, still reverberate in what the Enquirer irreverently styles "the Pantheon, née the Church of the Holy St. Vickers." Mr. Thomson, it seems, a "brawny young Scotsman," recently preached there on that subject; which revives pleasant reminiscences of the first itinerant campaign of the Association, and also of the kind welcome it received in the Queen City. Mr. Vickers, then pastor of the radical society, is now the librarian of the chief library of the place, for which position his fine scholarship eminently fits him.

REV. L. P. HICKOK, D.D., LL.D., has just published a work entitled The Logic of Reason, Universal and Eternal. All logic hitherto known has given out in the attempt to refute unbelief, and Christianity is under the dire necessity of inventing "a better logic"! Of this remarkable book the Boston Advertiser remarks: "Without attempting to present here any judgment upon the merit of the new Logic of Reason, it may be remarked that it is of the utmost significance as touching present controversies that a man like Dr. Hickok is persuaded that the contest against scepticism cannot be successfully waged by any system of logic now in vogue. It is a more open and utter confession of defeat than has yet been made by anybody holding similar views."

PROFESSOR SEELYE, lecturing recently at the Yale Divinity School, referred to the "5,000,000" inhabitants of Madagascar as a triumphant proof of the proselytizing power of the modern missionary system. Dr. Mullens and Rev. Joseph Pillans, however, commissioners from the London Society which has the island in charge, have just spent a year on the spot, and make a report which honestly pricks this great Madagascar bubble. It appears that the Hova queen christianized whole communities by order; the entire population is estimated at less than two and a half millions; the number of nominal Christians is only about 300,000, of whom 60,000 are church members, while only 20,000 to 25,000 are rated as sincere Christians; and the commissioners are of opinion that the work in Madagascar is "just beginning"! In short, to quote the Independent's condensation of the report: "How to reduce the excessive number of communicants hastily introduced into the Church, especially by native laborers, is the problem of the future, and the real progress of the Madagascar Church will for a time be shown by a diminution rather than an increase of the roll of communicants." Professor Seelye must find better proofs of success than this, if he wishes to convince reasonable minds that the whole missionary enterprise is not a great and costly mistake, a sad waste of money and men and noble enthusiasm well worthy of a better cause.

The Coming Religion.

A LECTURE DELIVERED IN MUSIC HALL, BOSTON, MARCH 1, 1874, AND REPEATED BEFORE THE RADICAL CLUB, AT MRS. SARGENT'S, MAY 18, 1874.

BY FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

In no century of the world's history has there been greater strength or sincerity of religion than in the nineteenth. Doleful jeremiads are often chanted, as if the state of things were quite otherwise; but they issue chiefly from throats habituated to proclamations of an outgrown gospel. Those who see religion in a faith which can be learned out of a book, and discern little or none elsewhere, see only irreligion in what our posterity will study as a magnificent manifestation of the religious nature of man. Especially are the clerical functionaries who wear the robes of official instructors of the people in spiritual things addicted above all others to ignorance of a great fact immediately under their eyes. What they see, to be sure, is true enough: the people are daily given over more and more to scepticism, rationalism, radicalism, and freethinking of countless shades, and—worst of all—they seem to like it! The author of the inimitable Essays of Elia tells of the swineherd Ho-ti and his son Bo-bo, who never tasted roast pig till their house one day burned over their heads, and cooked a whole litter by accident; whereupon, also by accident, they discovered the deliciousness of the new dainty, and thereafter contrived to get up a timely conflagration whenever the old sow farrowed. A similar contentment seems to follow the combustion of the various old religious rookeries which mankind have so long been wont to inhabit: somehow or other, notwithstanding their apparent homelessness in matters of faith, they find a marvellous compensation for the loss, and the combustions go bravely on. This inexplicable resignation alarms the custodians of the people's spiritual interests, and they mourn loudly over the "decay of religion;" whereas nothing has decayed but the miserable shanties under which for a while they housed her. Once escaped from the equivocal shelter of worm-eaten timbers and a roof which only partially hindered direct observation of the heavenly bodies, religion rejoices in her new-found liberty, and begins to grow sound of limb and ruddy of cheek.

Never before were there such multiplied evidences of religious activity as meet us now on every hand. Even the daily papers are obliged to recognize it; they seek to meet a felt public want by reporting Sunday services once a week, and by paying special attention to the meetings of ecclesiastical bodies. But this is a very superficial indication of the fact I refer to. The ministers are right in announcing the presence of a vast amount of doubt, incredulity, indifference, or even vehement rejection, so far as religion in their sense of the word is concerned. Less and less interest is manifested in the mystical enterprise of "coming to Jesus." The attempt to make all human life rotate about the axis of his thought, his influence, his offices, or his salvation, seems daily more and more remote from real human interests, and in fact hostile to them. The word "Christ" is going out of vogue, and the word "humanity" is coming up in its stead. One proof of this is the tendency of the most popular preachers to mean "humanity" when they say "Christ." The hold which such men as Beecher and Murray and Brooks have on the community is very evidently traceable to their humanitarianism, not to their Christology; and although the name of Jesus is frequent on their lips, in some way they make it felt by their hearers that their real discourse is of to-day and not yesterday,—of the great swarms of living and moving humanity all about them rather than of the one great life now drifted two thousand years in their rear.

But all those who still live in that intensely personal religion which makes Jesus the supreme fact itself, and not a mere symbol or illustration of the supreme fact, grieve over the popularity of such semi-rationalistic preachers as revealing a terrible decay of religion in the public. They are right: the species of religion they believe in is truly decaying, all outward success to the contrary notwithstanding. Churches may multiply, and grow more luxurious, and be more densely thronged; but the resort to luxury only shows that in these incredulous days the church-religion must be baited with elegant upholstery and stained windows and operatic music and fashionable outfits in priest and people, before the hook will be swallowed and the fish hauled in. The austere and solemn faith which once thrived on pine pews, and meeting-houses as cold and bare as barns, has even in the churches only the tradition of life to-day. The "means of grace" are growing so costly that only the rich can afford to be saved; Lazarus revolts with reason against lying at Dives' door to starve on crumbs, while Dives makes his camel trot, head erect, through the needle's eye. So the great surging river of the unchurched swells in volume every day; as Rev. G. J. Mingins, of the New York City Missions, reports, not ten per cent. of the laboring population attend church in that city, and not two per cent. in London. As luxury comes in, religion goes out; and the poor begin to find Christianity as much out of their reach as brown-stone palaces or oyster suppers. What sort of welcome does the poor man find in the magnificent churches on the Back Bay? We all know; he cannot afford to pay for a seat, and usually has too much self-respect to accept a seat on charity. Yet how have those churches been built? The money that built them has been raised chiefly in two ways: first, by the sale of real estate formerly occupied by the societies in the business centre of Boston, which they were able to hold, in consequence of tax-exemption, until the rise in its value had made them rich, although the money thus saved from the tax-gatherer was paid in their stead involuntarily by the whole community, and chiefly by the great mass of poor people who are now by the mere fact of poverty shut out of the very churches they have thus been compelled to erect; secondly, by the borrowing of great sums of money in order to complete the new edifices in a little more costly and extravagant style than any previously constructed, although these loans now constitute a great burden of debt, which cannot be paid except by exhausting the surplus means of the generous rich, and thus depriving real charities of the aid they so much need. Thus Christianity is becoming every day more and more of a rich-man's religion, and less and less of a poor-man's religion. What wonder that it decays, when it grows so indifferent to the great humanity which it professes it came to save?

The truth is that the intense, solemn, burning faith of our forefathers in the great doctrines of the Gospel, which made them apostles, martyrs, devotees, and enthusiasts of the sternest and most fanatical type, has died out of modern hearts in its pure form, and only survives in the form of a diluted and overstrained sentiment which cannot withstand the multiplying attacks of modern thought. It is this decay of the old intellectual system of Christianity, of the great, coherent structure of Christian dogma, that now drives the churches instinctively to rely on the power of fashion, of luxury, of the still undecayed social prestige of their ancient religion. But this is only postponing the evil day. Let the tree's heart go to decay,—let the dry-rot consume its once living centre,—and the death of the branches, green as they may look, is only a question of time. The long wail of the churches themselves, uttered through the mouths of all its preachers who discern the growing apathy or antipathy of mankind to the old fundamental doctrines by which the Christian religion must stand or fall, is pathetic enough to those who dare not look beyond its limits to find truth, light, and hope for the world; but to others it is the herald's trumpet announcing the coming of a better day.

In this decay of religion in its Christian form, I see only an evidence of the indestructible vitality of religion in a better form. My thought is not despondent or fearful, but on the contrary buoyant and full of cheer; and I am here to-day, not to attend the funeral or sing the dirge of a dead religion, but rather to tell you what I have learned of the COMING RELIGION—the new faith that is as old as man, yet lurks still unrecognized in his heart, and only here and there has made a voice for itself in the world. I said at the outset that the nineteenth century is preëminently religious; I believe it; and will now try to show what I mean by such a statement, coupled as it is with the other statement that religion as commonly understood is decaying.

Let me begin by giving you the best definition I can frame of religion—the best because it seems the simplest, the least pedantic, the least abstract. It has been much criticised, and by minds for which I entertain great respect; but I find no better one, none that appears to emphasize so clearly the one essential thing,—the fact that religion means NOBLE HUMAN LIVING, rather than creed, or sentiment, or ceremony. This is the definition I have to offer:—

Religion is the effort of Man to perfect himself in all his relations.

Not simply the effort of a man to perfect himself, though that too is included; but the effort of Man, Humanity, Mankind,—Man with a big M, if you please,—to reach by faithful and persistent endeavor the goal marked out in human nature itself, and evermore to struggle upwards towards the beautiful, the true, the good, despite all obstacles and discouragements, whether from within or without. So far as you and I are concerned, religion is our individual effort to reach the perfect standard of character which is given in our own highest ideals, and to do all that lies in our little power to bring the whole world also to the same high standard. So far as the world at large is concerned, religion means the collective effort of human society to secure a state of things in which justice, truth, and love shall rule, and to afford to every man, woman, and child the utmost possible assistance in achieving a noble career. Are not these the essential things? Is not he the truly religious man who thus strives to perfect or elevate himself and his race, and to make a heaven here and now as real and complete as the nature of things permits? And is he not religious just in proportion as he makes this effort? If so,—if these are the essential things,—then I think that the definition I give states the prime and all-important fact as simply and as directly as any brief sentence can. I admit, as Mr. Frothingham has said, that it needs to be explained before its fulness of meaning can be taken in; and I have not begun to unfold all that it includes in my own thought. But I cannot help thinking that his own definition—"Religion is the vital relation of the part to the whole"—needs even more explanation before the common mind can take it in. The trouble is that religion means so much that no concise phrase can utter it all; yet a concise phrase which brings out in bold relief its most essential characteristic will be of great practical use. Excellent as other definitions are, and especially excellent as I consider Mr. Frothingham's, I do not think that any one of them sufficiently concentrates attention on the fact that religion is primarily an effort, a putting forth of personal and social power, directed towards the one object of making human life here and now truer, better, and more beautiful,—that is, more perfect. To define it as an abstract "recognition," or "attraction," or "relation," takes religion out of the world of real life, in which men are battling for practical objects of all grades of worth or worthlessness, and represents it as something having no connection with them; whereas to define it as the effort of Man to perfect himself brings it into this world of warring ambitions as that which, under whatever phrases it may be described, must stand as the object for which all good men and women live. In general terms, therefore, I can find no definition or description of religion which so forcibly brings out its central characteristic as the one I have given: Religion is the effort of Man to perfect himself.

Let no one be disturbed because religion thus defined does not include an avowal of faith in God and Immortality. If these great ideas are truths, be sure that Man cannot advance very far in the search for truth without finding that out: and no one will say that the search for truth is not a part of the road to perfection. I certainly have no fears for the safety of any truth, and am unreservedly willing to trust those sublime ideas to the custody of the same human mind which has conceived them. The definition of religion now given goes back of and beneath all products of human faculties, and requires the development and cultivation of the faculties themselves. It neither affirms nor denies God and Immortality; but it does affirm the obligation of improving and strengthening the very faculties which in the past have led men to believe in both. The substance of religion itself, the earnest devotion of all our powers to the higher development of our human nature, is common both to theists and atheists; and this fact, so repugnant to the narrow prejudice of the churches, must be clearly seen and openly avowed. If the higher development of human nature shall lead to a profounder belief in God and an intenser hope of Immortality, as I think it will, those who now believe and hope will find their belief and hope confirmed; but if not, it will be because their grounds are weak and false, and will be undermined whether we do or do not affirm them in a definition. No lover of truth has in either case any reason to fear. It remains clear to my own mind that religion itself is a broader and more general fact than theism; and the definition should correspond to the fact. If it be a correct one, then the nurture and culture of the human faculties are more important than the vindication of any of the results they have thus far achieved.

Suppose that a watch-factory has succeeded in turning out work superior to that of any similar factory, yet that the superintendent perceives defects in the watch he makes. What will he naturally endeavor to do, if he finds that his watch is the best he can make under the circumstances? Clearly, he will try to improve his machinery; he will study how to make it more exact, more delicate, more ingenious in obviating the defects he perceives. This is precisely what religion will do, perceiving the defects in human society: it will try to improve the machinery,—that is, the human faculties of which society is the result. It will try to develop these faculties to a finer and higher efficiency, sure that in so doing it will provide in the best possible manner for producing a finer result in human society and character. This is, then, my fundamental conception of the nature and scope of religion: that it consists essentially in improving the machinery,—in carrying up to a higher development the elementary powers, capacities, and faculties of universal man, by stimulating his voluntary self-consecration to a nobler effort in this direction.

Such is the aspect of the Coming Religion, looked at in a large and comprehensive way. But I do not mean to leave my subject here, in the region of mere general statements. Kindle the fires of deep religious purpose in a single human soul, and they will quicken, warm, and inspire him to very definite activities. Set them blazing in many souls, and they will illuminate the world with the light of a great historic movement. The Coming Religion, kindling the heart of man with the grand aspiration for fuller and finer being, will urge him forward and upward in many ways:—

1. The perfection of the human intellect must come first, being first in the order of nature. Nothing can be done, either for good or ill, without intelligence. To strengthen this, to increase knowledge, to promote the discovery of truth by rendering keener and more far-sighted the eyes that are searching for it, is important above all things. The religion of the past has always been, and still is, jealous of the intellect; it has branded it as "carnal reason," and, loading it with chains, set it to hewing wood and drawing water in the service of false and gloomy creeds; it has anathematized the "pride of intellect," till the poor world dared not think at all without a shudder and a fearful glance over the shoulder, as if the Arch-Fiend were about to swoop down upon it astride of a thunder-bolt. Christianity has so long been ashamed of brain that it has no cause to complain now, if brain is ashamed of it. The first care of the Coming Religion will be to educate, enlarge, develop, strengthen, and encourage the activity of the human mind. Nothing shall be sacred from the peering eye of thought, which has a permit from Nature herself to go wherever it can. The "Church of the Future" is something I am very chary of mentioning, having more than a suspicion that what is coming will be so utterly unlike the Church as to make the name a misnomer. But of one thing I am sure: if there is to be a Church, its corner-stone, aye, the stones of all four of its corners, will be EDUCATION. Schools and colleges of a better sort than any now existing, in which the freedom of mind that to-day is only a hope and a dream will be the atmosphere breathed by all lungs, will be everywhere; nobody will fancy he can bring up his child in ignorance, any more than he will fancy he can put out its eyes or lop off its feet; and nobody will grumble at paying his school-taxes. The Coming Religion will have such reverence for truth, such hunger for knowledge, and such respect for intellect, by which alone truth and knowledge can be won, that a man who cannot read shall be as great a curiosity as a two-headed calf, and make the fortune of the "Barnum of the Future," if the Barnum species shall not then be as extinct as the dodo.

2. But reverence for conscience will come with the Coming Religion, as surely as reverence for intellect. The defalcations and betrayals of trust that now disgrace the commercial world, the corruption and venality that make politics a miasmatic swamp in which all virtue seems to sicken and die about the third day, the extravagance, heartlessness, and emptiness of fashionable life, will perish in a purer air. If the Coming Religion had arrived, the "young Christian soldier" would not to-day be Collector of the Port of Boston. It will bring by and by a high and stern integrity in all private, business, and political circles, a spirit of justice between man and man, a loftiness of aim and an earnestness of purpose, of which some noble examples can be found in the crowds about us, but which stand out with painful conspicuousness in the average life of this so-called Christian country. The cliques squabbling for the spoils in all public places, the rings plotting everywhere to grow fat on stolen funds, the unscrupulous competitions and enmities which make business too often a free fight in which every honest man is in danger of being scalped, show to any observant mind the need of a great revival of something better than religion, if religion means only what the world has hitherto known by that name. Justice, honesty, truthfulness, forbearance, good-will, unselfishness,—these are the great needs of the hour, not five-hundred-thousand-dollar meeting-houses, and choirs that mistake them for theatres; and the Coming Religion will recall men's attention to the unheeded gospel of conscience.

3. No less than intellect and conscience, the Coming Religion will emphasize the need of force of will, strength of character, well developed and powerful individuality. The tendency of all democracies is to invest the opinion of the majority with something of the sanctity which cleaves to the "divine right" of kings. It is a tendency which needs to be counteracted, or the republic will become a bag of nickels, each one a fac-simile of its fellows. Not only in the national and State governments is there need of a higher principle, but the self-government of the individual should also be so administered as to ensure self-respect. The sanctity of freedom in the formation and expression of opinions,—the right of each individual to follow out the dictates of his own mind, so long as they impel to no infringement on the rights of others,—the need of private energy and force of character, if the community is to be anything better than a flock of sheep following its leader blindly and aimlessly over the wall,—all this is part and parcel of the Coming Religion, which takes each person as it finds him, and simply aims to make the most of him by fostering all his faculties in their due proportion and right relation.

4. So, too, the human affections which light up this world with so much of tender beauty and gentle splendor, cheering us on every side as we walk through life's entanglements, and shining like the stars above us when the night comes to withdraw from us the glaring light of day,—these are sacraments of the Coming Religion. They are too often neglected in the strife of eager passions; men compete so frantically with each other that the uproar and confusion of affairs drown the claims of their milder nature, and so they grow crabbed and cold, like Scrooge in the exquisite tale of Dickens. Friendship has its claims, and he who knows not the value of a friend, nor counts it as above all price,—who never glows with the generous devotion that friendship kindles, nor stands ready to sacrifice all but honor and truth in its behalf,—has a great vacuum in his being which Nature most assuredly abhors, or, if Nature is too busy to attend to his case, then humanity at the least. Broaden out this grand and simple sentiment of friendship till it becomes goodwill to all,—and you have universal fraternity, the most precious dream of every noble spirit, and one which the Coming Religion consecrates as the great golden hope of the future. In all their countless aspects, the affections, rightly directed, come to elevate, purify, sweeten, and expand existence, and to whisper benedictions in the ear which it seems like profanation to talk about in public places.

Thus in its effort to perfect the individual man, the Coming Religion wakens his intellect, rouses his conscience, invigorates his will, feeds his affections; it develops and fertilizes his whole being, making even the wilderness blossom like the rose, and bringing abundant harvests of good out of what the Christian religion had condemned as irretrievably worthless and totally depraved. But it does not stop with the effort to be as the dew and the sunshine to his parched and barren character; it seeks to rectify the wretched social conditions which have made it impossible for him to grow up into a rich fulfilment of his own nature, and thus strives to free him from the burdens of a fate which his mere will is powerless to overcome. When society has caught the inspiration and learned the lessons of the Coming Religion, it will set about studying the laws which govern its own development, with the avowed intent of bettering the conditions surrounding its own members to the utmost extent of its combined power. These outward conditions of life are not to be made sweet and health-giving by any one man's exertions: it will take the aid of all, their hearts all aglow with the same deep enthusiasm of humanity, to prepare the soil in which characters of the finest possible beauty and productiveness shall grow. The combined wisdom, zeal, and resources of a whole race will yet work greater miracles than any ascribed in questionable books to questionable deities.

1. First of all come the conditions of physical health—the sanitary laws which ignorance may break, but which all the prayers of Christendom cannot mend. Good air, good food, good exercise, good surroundings of all kinds; good parents first of all, then good companions, good instructors, good opportunities for obeying the laws of physical well-being. The Coming Religion will make a cleaner sweep through the tenement houses and crowded, fetid, unhealthy homes of all our great cities than the Great Fire of 1872 made through the business quarters of Boston. Dwelling-houses, school-houses, public halls, churches, all will be built as they ought to be, with due regard to dryness, ventilation, comfort, and decency. Who can expect good morals anywhere, if the physical surroundings fore-ordain disease and crime? Let us make up our minds to an immense revolution in all these things, when the Coming Religion gets fairly launched on this planet.

2. The political conditions will be scarcely less changed, when that longed-for day arrives. Farewell then to caucus-rule and the tyranny of rings! What sort of free government is this, when the manifest will of a great city cannot secure the officials of its choice? Republicanism will be the deadest of all dead failures, if it proves unable to put good men into public office. Turn upon this problem all the light of the best minds, until some system is devised by which virtue and capacity, not knavery and ignorance, shall be put into places of trust and profit. Hang your flags at half-mast, if the present state of things is the best possible; for liberty is dead, and honesty is chief mourner. Revolution itself will be no remedy, if the people have not sense and virtue enough to take care of their own supreme interests.

3. The social or industrial conditions will be so arranged, when the Coming Religion has at last come, that buyers and sellers, employers and employed, shall no longer be arrayed in deadly hostility each to the other. While monopolies rule, and great corporations buy up Congresses and State Legislatures at pleasure,—while immense strikes and communistic outbreaks are the order of the day,—what chance is there for a free and self-respecting humanity? I look for no help from eight-hour laws which are to override all freedom of private contract,—or from trades-unions which exercise the fiercest and stupidest of despotisms both over their own members and their outside fellow-craftsmen,—or from labor-reforms which fly in the face of the best-established laws of political economy, when these laws are no more under the control of human volition than are the laws of celestial mechanics. It is time for the Coming Religion to put in an appearance before society goes to pieces under the disintegrating action of widespread ignorance,—time for it to educate the people, and all the people, in the elements of social science,—time for it to teach capitalists that all their wealth, over and above the small amount requisite to give them food, clothes, and shelter, is (morally considered) held in trust by them for public uses, and that it is no voluntary exercise of condescending charity, but rather the fulfilment of the simplest and clearest duty, to devote it to the general good in rational ways,—time for it to teach laborers that their hope of redress from all their wrongs and woes lies in an intelligent co-operation which shall make the universal good, not their own private good, the object of their efforts. Knowledge, knowledge, knowledge,—that is what the people need, whether rich or poor; knowledge of social, politico-economical, and above all moral laws, to the end that justice rather than private greed or class-jealousy may govern all their action. No man has a moral right to more than he can use; every man has a right to that. The rich owe it to humanity to use their surplus for humanity's good: the poor have indeed a claim for the just re-distribution of wealth which they too have helped to create.

4. Lastly, the conditions of domestic life need also to be greatly changed by the Coming Religion of justice, purity, and love. Marriage is rightly enough a civil contract before the law—a contract of a very special kind, inasmuch as it brings into being third parties whose rights vitally affect the contract itself. So far as is possible without great detriment to society, the marriage contract ought to be subject to dissolution, provided the dissolution is as public, and as voluntary on both sides, as the original contract. But the case is one of great delicacy. The object of marriage is to establish homes; and the sanctity and preservation of this institution of homes, in all safety, purity, and happiness, are interests of such transcendent importance to the whole community that they can not be disregarded without deep and widespread mischief. Although a purely civil contract before the law, marriage ought to be a religious contract between the parties themselves,—not to be lightly formed, not to be lightly broken, but to be revered as creating the most sacred relation into which two human beings can enter. Where there are no children, actual or prospective, I think society might with safety to itself permit the dissolution of the marriage contract on the publicly recorded agreement of both parties, duly made according to forms of law. Where children exist, I think divorce might be safely permitted only on condition that the parties themselves previously provide, by mutual agreement, for the proper support and care of the children; and, except in rare cases, I would have no divorce legal, and no application for divorce considered by the courts, before this agreement had been made in writing, signed by both parties with witnesses, and with due security for its execution. This would prevent separation until the parties had fully considered all the consequences of it, to themselves and others, and effectually guarded society from the burden of supporting children unprovided for by the parents. It would also prevent the harrowing contests in the courts, after divorce had been granted, respecting the custody of children. But all these miserable attempts to rectify the evils of ill-assorted marriages, which can never be fully rectified in any way, only bring out vividly the need of greater wisdom and greater elevation of motive in the formation of all marriages. The Coming Religion will invest the marriage tie with such grave responsibility and solemn significance, that divorce under almost any circumstances will be a social disgrace to one or both of the parties divorced; and this is well. This being the case, the laws should deal only with the external relation, and the consequences they directly involve with respect to society at large; and I think that the suggestions I have made will be found worthy of thoughtful and dispassionate reflection.

Such appear to be the chief social conditions which the Coming Religion will not fail to consider, and more or less profoundly to affect. It must not only develop the individual, but also the social life of man, in accordance with the necessary conditions imposed by his own nature and the nature of things. This brings me very briefly to touch on the relations which man bears to the universe as a whole, which can nowise be neglected by the Coming Religion.

The harmony of the private life with itself can be secured only by the full and proportionate development of all the faculties of the individual. The harmony of the social life of man with itself can only be secured by the full and proportionate development of all individuals, with the highest freedom of each that is compatible with the equal freedom of all. The harmony of human life, both in its individual and social aspect, with the great whole of universal Nature, can only be secured by complete conformity with the laws, physical and moral, which govern this universal whole. Knowledge of these universal laws is called science; and voluntary obedience to them by man might well be called religion, since thus alone he can attain to the perfection which it is the effort of all religion to realize. Now this harmony of man with Nature is most complete when most conscious, free, and glad; and it follows that he will be in the highest sense religious who enters willingly, cheerfully, and gladly into the relation of entire harmony between himself and the universal All. Names are of small moment, when ideas of such sublimity engage our thoughts; yet I freely confess to you that no name for this universal All, with which every rational and sincere mind desires most profoundly to be at peace, is so sweet, so satisfying, so true, as the name of God. Believing as I do that the universal All is as truly one with itself as I am one with myself, and that this oneness is only possible in the sense of being spiritual in nature, I find great elevation and dignity in the thought that God is the great reality of which all minor realities are parts or elements. So far as I may venture to give you my own conjectures of what the Coming Religion may be, I find my thought leading me irresistibly to the conclusion that voluntary oneness with this Infinite One, this Spiritual Unity of the All, is the supreme idea, aspiration, and joy of the Coming Religion, including as it does every element of that perfection which all true religion aims to realize. In it my intellect and my heart alike find the satisfaction of all their cravings; and, be my future what it may, I am content to leave my destiny, without misgivings of any kind, to the final arbitrament of the Power which pervades the All, which has made me what I am, which calls me to profound oneness with itself, and which, in the immensity of my own ignorance, I can call by no better name than God.

"THE SONG OF THE ANGELS."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Having lately read John Stuart Mill's Three Essays on Religion, and it being Christmas day, I am strongly reminded of a different religious essay, now forty years old, by Rev. Enoch Pond, Professor of Theology in Bangor, Maine. My attention was specially attracted in 1834 to this latter essay, entitled "The Song of the Angels," because in the third number of the Literary and Theological Review, edited by Leonard Woods, Jr., it immediately preceded an article by Eleazar Lord, Esq., of New York, "On Special Efforts by the Church to Subvert the Unhallowed Institutions of the World." In this article, that pious and distinguished layman washed the hands of the Christian Church of this "Christian" century of any obligation or intent to make any "special effort" to subvert the institution of slavery, then beginning to be considered rather "unhallowed," even by some of the "world's" people. And why should the Church subvert it, when some individual churches held slave property, and thousands of church-members were slave-holders? He, in fact, came down upon the wicked abolitionists who were church-members, as I then was, with a solemnity of admonition to keep quiet, which those of us who are still living cannot have forgotten.

The preceding article of Prof. Pond was undoubtedly a sermon which had been preached from the Congregational pulpit of that day. I think there are not many Congregational pulpits where anybody would dare to preach it to-day, though it is from a Christmas text. Indeed, I doubt whether its reproduction in the Congregationalist newspaper could now be procured short of its highest advertising price, if at that. I would willingly subscribe a little to have the experiment tried. The Church, like the rest of the world, has moved in forty years.

The text of Prof. Pond's discourse was that memorable passage, the fourteenth verse of the second chapter of Luke's gospel, of double or doubtful reading in the Greek, which has been a bone of contention among theologians for centuries, or ever since Origen and Chrysostom. King James' translators make nothing of it but this:—

"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men."

The vexed question among the translators and commentators has been, whether the historian Luke meant to put in the mouths of his alleged celestial visitants merely an ascription of thanks to God for the peace and brotherhood to come among men generally as a consequence of the birth of Mary's child, or only for the salvation from hell which was to come to the elect, or to the men who, being predestined from all eternity to be so saved, should have the "good-will" or disposition to accept the terms of salvation. The learned professor does not enter into the exegetical quarrel, but obviously takes the passage in the last-mentioned sense.

He confesses himself exceedingly puzzled to see how an omnipotent and infinitely benevolent God should allow sin and misery to triumph eternally over a large portion of the angelic and human races. It is too much for his reason, and he is obliged to rest it entirely on divine revelation. In doing so he seems to be delightfully satisfied that God will get glory and praise enough from the whole universe for the infinite ingenuity of his plan of redemption, applied only to the people of this little planet, to compensate for any inconvenience which fallen angels or lost men may suffer—miserable sinners whose mouths will be eternally stopped by the fact that they might have been saved—the angels, if they had only been born men, and the men if they had only heard of the gospel and accepted it. The professor does not state, but rather leaves it to be inferred, that, so far as the moral creations of God are concerned, the happiness of the universe, minus the sufferings of hell, exceeds that of any universe the omnipotent could have made without a hell.

Prof. Pond's earnestness in the absurd faith of a God so horribly anthropomorphic is very touching, and I cannot even now help regarding it with a great deal of respect and reverence. But oh, how useless, if not worse! A Church founded on this faith had been in the world almost two thousand years, had been reformed and re-reformed, and yet it refused to make any special effort to subvert slavery, and left all such efforts to be made outside of it.

This curious relic of New England theology forty years ago may doubtless be found in the Congregational library of this city, and is well worth reading in connection with Mill's essays, by anybody. I enclose a few pages of the "Song of the Angels," which have escaped the teeth of time and mice in my garret, in the hope that you will make some extracts that will interest, if they do not convert, your readers.

EXTRACTS FROM "THE SONG OF THE ANGELS."

I have hinted already at the displays of justice which were made in the punishment of fallen angels, before man was created, or his redemption was revealed. But the justice displayed in the punishment of these angels cannot be so illustrious or glorious as that manifested in the punishment of those who have done what the ruined angels never did—who have not only broken the law of God, but trodden under foot his Son, and done despite to the spirit of his grace.

Connected with the song of the angels, as it has been here explained, are several important subjects which require attention. And,

1. It appears from what has been said, that some good reasons may be assigned for the existence of sin. I am aware that the existence of sin—that abominable thing which God hates,—in a world sustained and controlled by his wisdom and power, is a deep and mysterious subject; too deep in some of its bearings to be sounded by the brief line of human reason. I am aware, also, of the danger of meddling with subjects that are too high for us, and of roaming abroad in but speculations beyond the limits of knowable things. But if secret things belong unto God, those which are revealed belong to us and our children. And if any light can be gathered from revelation in regard to this great and difficult subject, surely we have a right to gather it.

Some have supposed that God permitted sin because he could not exclude it, and have a moral system; or, in other words, that if he created worlds, and peopled them with free moral agents, the existence of sin would be an inevitable consequence. He could hedge it about, and reduce it within the narrowest possible limits; but if there were free moral agents, there must be sin; and the sin which actually exists in the universe is the least that a God of infinite perfection and power could possibly make it.

With this explanation, I hardly need say, I am not satisfied. If it removes one difficulty, it plunges us into others which are far greater. If God could not have prevented the existence of sin, with what propriety do we speak of his permitting it? How permit that which he could not prevent? We might as well talk about permitting the sun to rise in the east rather than in the west; or permitting water to run down hill rather than up. Besides: if God could not have excluded sin from the created universe, then where is his government over the moral world? And what are we to do with those numerous and unqualified declarations of Scripture, which represent the hearts of men as in his hand as the rivers of water, to turn them whithersoever he will?

If God governs the moral world by a direct efficiency, he certainly could have excluded sin. This is, on all sides, admitted. Or, if we reject this theory, and suppose that he has no control over the hearts of creatures but by the presentation of motives, the same conclusion seems to me inevitable. For are not the motives in favor of right doing intrinsically stronger than those in favor of wrong doing, in every supposable case? And could not God, if he were to put in requisition all the resources of his wisdom and power, so present the motives in favor of right doing as to make them appear stronger than those in favor of wrong doing, in every case; and thus exclude the wrong perpetually, and secure the will of the creature forever on the side of right?

The theory that if God had undertaken to exclude sin from the universe he would not have had motives enough to do it seems to me to involve an inherent absurdity. For is not sin, in every instance, a breaking through of powerful motives and strong obligations—so strong as to render the perpetrator deserving of eternal condemnation? Is not as much as this implied in the very idea of sin? And yet, according to the supposition, sin entered the universe, and continues in it, from a lack of motives to prevent it. If God had undertaken to exclude it, he must, from a want of motives, have been unable to accomplish his design.

If sin entered the universe for this reason, I submit whether it would not cease to be sin, and whether the agent in it might not be excused, and even justified? How could he be to blame in doing that for the avoiding of which there were no sufficient motives in existence, which were or could be presented to his mind?

But I design not to dwell on this view of the subject. Suffice it to say that I reject the theory which accounts for the existence of sin on the ground that God could not have excluded it, consistently with the free agency of creatures, as one that involves far greater difficulties than those which it attempts to remove. We are under the necessity, therefore, either of considering the existence of sin as altogether unaccountable, or of resorting to some other mode of accounting for it. And happily we discover light beaming into the otherwise impenetrable darkness from the views which have been presented in the foregoing remarks. There is glory to God in the highest, in that there is peace on earth and good-will to men. The great work of redemption by Christ is calculated to advance the glory of God in the highest possible degree. But obviously there could have been no redemption if there had been no sin. Redeem what, whom, if there had been no sinners—lost, guilty creatures, who needed the interposition of an almighty Redeemer? God permitted sin, therefore, as it seems to me, because without it there would have been no room or occasion for redemption; and without redemption the glory of God could not have been displayed in the highest possible degree. The song of "Glory to God in the highest" in this case could never have been sung.

Do any say that this is changing the very nature of sin, and representing it as a good thing? But we urge, in reply, that the whole view which has been given necessarily supposes that sin is a bad thing—the worst of all things. Sinners would not need to be redeemed from that which was good. They would not need the precious blood of Christ to cleanse them from sin, if sin was not in its nature polluting, and if they were not polluted and vile.

Or will any say that according to the views which have been presented sin is the necessary means of the greatest good? But neither is this to be admitted, at least in the ordinary acceptance of the terms. A means always stands related to some end, and has a tendency to promote that end; whereas sin has no tendency to promote the greatest good, but all its tendencies are the other way. They are to evil, and only evil, and that continually. And it is only by being counteracted in its evil tendencies—it is only by a process of recovery and redemption from sin—that it becomes indirectly an occasion of showing forth the glory of the Supreme Disposer.

That the subject here considered is an embarrassing one, and that in some points of view there are difficulties attending it, no one will be disposed to deny. In the investigation of such a subject, it might be expected that there would be difficulties. But that the views which have been exhibited—the same, for substance, with those of Bellamy and his associates—are in unison with the great principles of revealed truth, and are based upon them; that they are attended with less difficulties than some which have been more recently advocated; and that they will bear the test of a thorough examination I have the fullest confidence.

2. It follows from what has been said that the great plan of Providence which God formed in eternity and is carrying into effect throughout the universe is the best one conceivable. It is believed by all Christians who make pretensions to Orthodoxy, that God has an eternal and universal plan, according to which events are taking place in every part of the universe. But it is doubted by some whether this is the best conceivable plan. It is admitted that it is the best practicable one—the best that God could carry into effect. But could he not conceive of a plan which should embrace all the good of the present system, with none of its evils—a plan which should have excluded sin and misery forever? To this I answer that God certainly could not have conceived of a plan which should embrace all the blessings which flow from redemption, and still not include redemption. And he could not have conceived of a plan which should include redemption, and still not include sin. In other words, he could not have conceived of a thing which, in itself, is inconceivable and impossible. Without doubt, God could have conceived of a plan, and might have adopted it, which should have excluded sin. But in excluding sin, it must have excluded redemption from sin, and all the surpassing, overbalancing blessings which flow to the universe in consequence of redemption; so that such a plan must have been, not better than that which is going into operation, but greatly inferior to it.

On the whole, we may conclude confidently that the existing plan of Providence is not only the best one practicable, but the best one conceivable. To be sure, it embraces incidental evils, but no more than can be overruled for a greater good; so that the system, as a whole, is one in which the infinite mind of the Deity rests with entire complacency. He sees that it must result in the highest glory to himself, and in the greatest blessings to the universe; that it secures, in the end, the utmost conceivable amount of good; and, as I said, the Infinite Mind rests in it with entire complacency.

Unless we take this view of the great plan of Providence, I see not how the Supreme Being can be happy. Suppose we take the other view, and say, "The plan of God is not the best one conceivable, but the best one practicable. He can conceive of something a great deal better, but if he had undertaken to accomplish it, he could not have succeeded. He is doing for the universe, not the best that he would, but the best that he can." And now I appeal to my Christian readers, Is this view of God pleasant to you? Or do you believe that, under such circumstances, a being occupying the place of God, and possessed of such perfections as we ascribe to him, could be satisfied with himself, or with the course he is pursuing, or that he could enjoy his existence at all? Do you imagine that he could be, in this case, what all Christians must believe that he is, infinitely happy as well as holy—the infinitely blessed God?

4. There is reason to believe, in view of what has been said, that this earth is an object of intense interest to the inhabitants of other worlds. We know not that redemption has been accomplished in any world but this. Indeed, we have no reason to suppose that such has been the fact. Why should it have been? Christ could add nothing to the glory or the moral effect of his sacrifice, were he to repeat it a thousand times. It seems necessary only that the story of redemption should be told in other worlds—that the wonders of mercy which have been accomplished here should be unfolded; and when this is done the heart of the Deity is at once opened, and his glory beams forth upon other intelligences as it does upon ourselves. And that this mighty subject has been unfolded to the view of myriads now invisible to us, and that in consequence of this their eyes are all turned and their interests bended downwards upon earth, there can be no doubt.

This earth is physically but an insignificant part of the material universe—a little island in an infinite ocean of space, a little province of an unbounded empire. And yet we know that to the inhabitants of other worlds it is a most interesting spot. I have sometimes thought of it, not indeed as the sun of the created universe, but rather as the silver moon. It shines with a reflected light; but yet it is all radiant with the glory of God, and is pouring forth light upon a multitude of topics connected with the divine character and conduct which otherwise must have remained in impenetrable darkness.

Redemption—whatever my readers may have been accustomed to think of it,—redemption is the glory of earth. And it is glory enough for one world to have been the theatre of such mighty achievements, and to be the centre of such engrossing interests. And oh! why are not men more deeply interested in this great work of redemption? When the inhabitants of other worlds are so deeply interested, why are the inhabitants of this so profoundly indifferent? Men, and not angels, are the subjects of redeeming mercy. It was for men, and not angels, that the Son of God came down and died. And yet, when angels are all intent, desiring to look into these things, men neglect them; men trifle with them; men, in thousands of instances, care nothing about them! Shame on such unaccountable stupidity and blindness! The conduct of the great mass of our fellow-men in this life, in treating the mighty subject of redemption as they do, must render them the shame, and I had almost said the scorn, of the intelligent universe.

6. It appears from what has been said, that those of our race who enjoy the offers of redeeming mercy and slight them, and finally perish in their sins, will be among the most despicable and miserable of all the creatures of God. For it will be known through the universe what opportunities they have enjoyed, and what they have abused; what distinguished mercy has been shown them, and how they have slighted it; and of all the wretched inhabitants of the lower world they will be regarded as least entitled to the sympathy and commiseration of their fellow-beings. The degraded heathen will look far down upon them and say, "If we had heard the same calls as you—if the privileges which you enjoyed had been bestowed upon us,—long ago should we have repented in sackcloth and ashes." And even the devils will stand aloof from these ruined despisers of Gospel grace, and reproach them with being more guilty and detestable than themselves. "You have done that," they will say, "which we never did. We only transgressed the law of God; but you—fools that you were,—you added to this rejection of the Gospel. You slighted offers, and resisted means, and trod under foot the Son of God. Complain not, then, that your prisons are deeper than ours, and that you are doomed to sink under a severer condemnation."

It is a dreadful thing to be a fallen angel, and to be reserved, as these angels are, in chains, under darkness, to the judgment of the great day. But it is a more dreadful thing to be a finally condemned and ruined sinner from under the Gospel. O yes, if I must go to the world of woe, let me be a demon of darkness—let me be anything—rather than to stand in the miserable company of those who have beheld and despised, and wondered, and perished, from under the glorious light and privileges of the Gospel. For such sinners must have reflections, tormenting reflections—they must have sources of anguish, bitter anguish, which none other among the damned ever can have. They must be emphatically the reproach and the scorn of the universe.

Does the eye of any impenitent sinner fall upon this page, and run over these fearful, monitory words? Oh, let him beware, lest all the evil, and more than all that has here been described, fall speedily upon him! Let him be wise, and take warning while he may. The door of mercy is still open. The call of mercy is yet sounding in his ears. Let him yield, then, to the motives of the Gospel, and the strivings of the spirit, and press into the kingdom of Christ before the doors of this kingdom are closed upon him, and he is lost forever.

A CONFUSED ORTHODOXY.

Strayed or stolen, New England Congregationalism, for whose recovery a liberal reward will be paid by President Asa D. Smith, of Dartmouth College. According to the subscriber's best recollection and belief, the creature bore the marks of the following creed, as written out by him for the Congregationalist, but which, being rejected by that paper, first appeared in the New York Observer:—

1. Total depravity, or, with whatever natural amiableness, the utter destitution of holiness. 2. The proper divinity of Christ. 3. The atonement, as a vicarious sacrifice for the sins of men. 4. Election, or the eternal purpose of God to save those whom he actually saves. 5. Regeneration, or the renewal of the heart by the Holy Spirit. 6. Justification, not on the ground of merit, but by faith alone. 7. The perseverance unto the end, through the promised grace of God, of all who are truly renewed. 8. The endless punishment of the finally impenitent.

It seems that President Smith is strongly under the impression that this strange beast is still roaming up and down the New England hillsides, while the Congregationalist newspaper regards him as extinct as the dodo, or at best as rare as the bear (ursus americanus). We wish to have it distinctly understood that it is not Dr. Smith who is lost. Like the Indian who was wandering in the woods, he would say: Indian no lost, Indian here; wigwam lost.

The particular utterance which gave rise to this affair was the declaration of the Congregationalist that "all accurately informed persons know very well that both the Unitarians and Orthodox have moved from their positions of doctrine and of practice of fifty years ago so far that there is nearly as much difference to-day between the present posture of each and that which it formerly occupied as there was then between each and the other—probably more than there now is between each and the other. Both have changed ground; and each has approached the other." Strange to say, the liberality of the Congregationalist is thoroughly endorsed by a no less straight-backed Presbyterian organ than the Chicago Interior. Perhaps Dr. Smith has not heard of the recent action of the Connecticut Congregational clergy, advising their churches to "let up" on the points for which he is so strenuous. Orthodoxy in the Granite State partakes of the primitive nature of the rocks, and is still proud of its igneous origin, but down this way it begins to show the effects of milder agencies. We suspect that even Dr. Smith, if he were asked to give an intelligent heathen his interpretation of Christianity, would find a good deal to say before he got to those eight points which he says were so dwelt upon in the lectures at the "Brimstone Church." But when he is expounding the gospel to his neighbors and students, he passes along the stone first, and we fear the hour is up sometimes before the bread is brought on. That is the way it used to be done, perhaps we ought to say; for of President Smith's personal dispensation we only know enough to incline us to a more favorable presumption.—Springfield Republican.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE ROMAN CATHOLICS.

LONDON, Nov. 18, 1874.

The discussion between Mr. Gladstone and the Roman Catholics is the sensation of the day. What adds bitterness to the controversy is that the apple of discord cast by Mr. Gladstone has affected the Roman Catholics in their relations to each other. That there should be an impassable chasm between them and Protestants is a matter of course; but that they should be at enmity among themselves was what many persons never anticipated. In reality, there is as little harmony and brotherly love between the old English Catholics and the more recent converts, and also the Irish Catholics, as there is between the extreme members of the Church of England and the Nonconformists. The Old Catholic families of England are quite as indisposed now to submit implicitly to the Pope as their ancestors were in days anterior to the Reformation. They have always been able to draw a line of demarcation between their religious and civil duties, and to refuse priestly dictation in the latter sphere as heartily as they accept it in the former. Thus it is easy for some of them, such as Lord Acton and Lord Camoys, to write to the Times and say that they do not yield allegiance to the Pope in other than purely spiritual matters, while more recent converts, such as the Marquis of Bute and the Marquis of Ripon, dare not make any such avowal. To have been the instrument of showing how little unity there was in the Roman Catholic camp, as Mr. Gladstone has been, is an unpardonable offence in the eyes of the ultramontanes. His pamphlet will do more than cause much talk for a few days. Its practical effect will be to alter in a thorough and final manner the relations of Roman Catholics to the liberal party. Since the days of Charles James Fox it has been customary for Roman Catholics to call themselves and to act as liberals in politics. They did so because the Tories had imposed disabilities upon them, and refused to admit them to the full privileges of citizenship. The liberals, though as antagonistic to the Catholics on religious grounds as the Tories themselves, held the principle that a man's religious belief was a matter with which the government had no concern, and thus they argued and strove for the removal of all badges of inferiority alike from the followers of the Pope, of Wesley, and of Priestley.

It was natural that Roman Catholics should ally themselves with those who were their friends, and hence the party which has been led in turn by Fox, Lord Grey, Lord Russell, Lord Palmerston, and Mr. Gladstone, should have had many supporters among the Roman Catholics both in and out of Parliament. Now, however, the case is altered. There is no political privilege enjoyed by members of the Church of England, which cannot be enjoyed on the same terms by any dissenter. I need hardly add that a Roman Catholic cannot sit upon the throne; but this cannot be classed among serious grievances; at all events, it is not a greater grievance than that which vexes many dissenters; namely, the establishment of the Church of England as the Church of the State. But the Roman Catholics of late years have been disposed to press their claims for something which would make them superior to their fellows who are Protestants, and they have aimed, particularly in Ireland, at dictating what shall be done to please them. Their views have been directed toward the advancement of their Church rather than the benefit of the country, and to execute whatever the Pope had enjoined. Members of the liberal party have been reluctant to say that they are no longer disposed to legislate in the interest of Roman Catholics. But now that Mr. Gladstone has put the case as he has done in his pamphlet, it will be easy for the alliance between the liberals and the Roman Catholics to be logically ended. Having nothing but fair play to hope for at the hands of the liberals, and having not even fair play to expect from the Tories, the Roman Catholics will now form a small band of men taking their instructions from the Pope, and making ineffectual attempts to gain the superiority over their Protestant brethren. The ultramontane leaders are not pleased at the prospect. They know that there is neither any likelihood nor any reason for Mr. Gladstone adopting the policy of Prince Bismarck, were he again in office, but they think it quite as damning to their hopes that he should have made it a condition for Roman Catholics to be accepted as members of the liberal party to declare that they are Englishmen first and Catholics afterwards. This explanation was needed, I think, to enable those at a distance to understand the real significance of Mr. Gladstone's pamphlet, and to exhibit how fruitful it may prove of results of national importance.—Advertiser.

COLONEL FORNEY, in his letter to the Philadelphia Press, thus describes Mr. Conway:—

"Another character seems to stand in a curious relation to this bitter controversy between the theologians. That is the strangely gifted and wholly original Moncure D. Conway, the head of the materialistic congregation at South Place Chapel, Finsbury, the temple in which for many years preached the celebrated W. J. Fox. Mr. Conway is a Virginian, who came here first as an advanced advocate of the Union cause seven years ago. Having been previously well-known in our country for the great ability with which he resisted the productions of slavery and took issue with the peculiar doctrines of the politicians in his native State, the prominence with which he identified himself with the North in London soon gave him a large hold among certain advanced thinkers, who have always sympathized with America.

"His ability is conceded to be of the highest order, and when I sat under him last Sunday I could not restrain my admiration of his genius. A tall, spare man of about forty, with a most intellectual yet ascetic face, closely resembling John A. Kasson of Iowa, member of the present Congress, his oratory is quite unpretending, rarely rising to declamation, and only when presenting his strongest point expressing intensity. He is of the materialistic school, in fact a bow-shot beyond John Stuart Mill in his theism, rejecting a personal deity and insisting that what we called God is within us—our inner conception, manifested by our aspirations after truth. It was a novel sensation to follow this brilliant student and scholar through his intricate reasonings in support of this position, and to mark the effect of his rhetoric upon his large and thoughtful audience, most of whom belonged to the better classes. They accept his platform with enthusiasm, and as most of them are people of rare culture, their number is rapidly increasing."

THE Church is yet to learn that its chief work is to be done by consecrated men of ordinary calibre. Great speeches never marshalled a host. An eminent Scotch divine getting into the pulpit after a week's elaboration of a learned discourse forgot it entirely, and was compelled to give a plain talk which, under God, swept half his audience into the kingdom. There is an absurd call in the Church to-day for what are called "big guns," and but little appreciation of well-loaded rifles. The "swamp angel" in the last war was a failure. It proposed to do great things; but after a while they found it was cracked, and were afraid to use it lest it blow up. So while men of but small capacity are doing their work well, and make no fuss about it, we have a few "big guns" half cracked with conceit about themselves, and they blow up just when they are wanted for important service. The nuisance of the Church to-day is ecclesiastical "swamp angels." Doctor Chalmers' astronomical sermons "make us see stars," but we suppose there were, at the time of their delivery, uncelebrated ministers of Christ in Scotland who were bringing more souls to the Saviour.—Christian at Work.

The Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 7, 1875.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 1, TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.

SUNDAY LECTURES.—The Editors of THE INDEX will lecture occasionally on Sundays, if desired, within a convenient distance of Boston.

THE complete works of Dr. Channing have just been published by the American Unitarian Association in one volume of 931 pages, with double columns and very clear type, at the surprisingly low price of $1.00. It is the most desirable edition of his works, and will undoubtedly find a large sale among those who are interested to know more of the chief representative man of the Unitarian denomination.

THE Liberal Worker, a new journal devoted to "the promulgation of Liberal Christianity" at the West, is edited at Sharon, Wisconsin, by Rev. George W. Cooke, with Rev. Messrs. Hunting, Balch, Kerr, Spencer, Simmons, Jones, and Harrington as editorial contributors. It is issued every other Wednesday, and costs a dollar a year. We find many excellent things in it, and wish it a prosperous career.

THE first series of Half-Hour Recreations in Popular Science, issued hitherto in periodical parts by Estes & Lauriat, is just published in a fine volume of nearly five hundred pages, containing very valuable scientific papers by R. A. Proctor, Rudolph Virchow, H. Schellen, Prof. Roscoe, J. N. Lockyer, Prof. J. D. Dana, Dr. Carpenter, Prof. Winchell, Prof. Huxley, J. H. Tick, E. B. Tylor, Dr. Richardson, Prof. T. Sterry Hunt, Prof. Clifford, Robert Hunt, Prof. H. W. Dove, and others. It is edited by Dana Estes, and enriched by good illustrations. Price, $2.50.

A BETTER story for boys cannot be found nowadays than F. Grant & Co., by Rev. George L. Chanev, of Boston. It is sparkling, racy, funny, serious, clever, noble—without a word of cant in it, but full of zest and life and the truest kind of truth. We know of three boys (one of them being the father of the other two) who have heard it read aloud by a sweet voice after tea, in nightly rations of delight; and the boys are the best judges of such books. This is a story of "partnerships," and contains some ideas on that subject which it is exceedingly wise to pack away in a youngster's head—a species of treatment to which in this case no youngster's head will object. The price is $1.50.

IT is with great pleasure that we announce to the readers of THE INDEX that Mr. George Jacob Holyoake, for nearly thirty years editor of the London Reasoner, and the most eminent of the early founders of the now widespread Secularist movement in England, has kindly consented to be an editorial contributor to this journal during the year 1875. He proposes to contribute an article to its columns monthly, and begins with one of very great interest in this first issue of the new year. We congratulate our subscribers on thus having an opportunity of becoming better acquainted with one of the most remarkable men of the present age, whose calm, just, and gentle spirit is no less beautiful than his opinions are able, fearless, and pronounced. Of course it need not be stated that Mr. Holyoake will express himself in THE INDEX with absolute freedom on whatever topic he may choose to treat; he has never shunned the responsibility of his own words, and will find himself in the company of those who will appreciate his most independent thought and utterance. On behalf of our readers, we extend a hearty and respectful welcome to Mr. Holyoake as a contributor to these pages; with a sincere hope that the blindness he alludes to will prove a merely temporary affair.

WHERE ARE WE?

AN APPEAL TO THOSE WHO THINK AND THOSE WHO DARE.

The voyager across the Atlantic must frequently determine his own latitude and longitude, or be tossed aimlessly about by the waves and winds. No less necessary is it to calculate our latitude and longitude on the vast ocean of thought, if we aspire to guide our own course by the compass of Reason. It is time to know where we are; it is time to act in accordance with that knowledge.

Christendom has been in constant intellectual motion ever since the time when the renaissance, and the Protestant Reformation to which it gave rise, broke up the long stagnation of dominant Catholicism. The modern mind has been for centuries gradually changing its attitude with respect to Christianity, disengaging itself more and more from the hierarchy and the theology of Rome, and deluding itself all the while with the belief that it was thus returning to the purity of "primitive Christianity." This constant process of disintegration in the great organism of the Church has from time to time manifested itself in the birth of new sects, each being a protest on behalf of freer thought against some earlier sect which it rent in twain; and yet the Catholics alone seem to be aware that this endlessly recurrent schism is a proof that Christianity itself begins to go to pieces, whenever it attempts to live independently of the historic root of Catholic authority. Sooner or later the one enormous delusion of Protestantism in all its forms,—namely, that a return to "primitive Christianity" is historically possible under modern conditions,—was fated to be at last dispelled; sooner or later, in some one of the extreme types of Protestantism arising in the last stages of the disintegration of the Christian organism, the discovery was fated to be made that Christianity and modern civilization are radically antagonistic, that Pope Pius IX. is right in proclaiming this antagonism in the Syllabus, and that the triumph of civilization means the extinction of Christianity.

The last great battle to vindicate the universal Protestant claim, that pure Christianity is the permanent religion of civilization, was fought by Theodore Parker, one of the grandest characters of our age. The Unitarianism of Dr. Channing was not the farthest possible position that could be held within the Christian lines; for it still affirmed supernaturalism in the Bible and in the Christ. Parker held a more extreme position by boldly denying supernaturalism in both, while at the same time he declared himself to be a Unitarian and a Christian. His right to these names, however disputed by his contemporaries, appears in a fact whose importance in this connection has been hitherto overlooked; namely, the fact that he still clung to supernaturalism in his doctrine of an immediate intuitional knowledge of God and Immortality, as truths of the supernatural order. This doctrine is the innermost citadel of the Christian religion, and has never been more valiantly defended than by Theodore Parker; it proves the sagacity of the instinct which has made the Unitarian denomination, since his death, canonize him as a saint of its calendar, and elevate him to a pedestal as lofty as that of Channing. Under the name "intuition," he magnificently defended the fortress of Christian "faith;" he recognized his own right to the Christian name, so long as he held the essence of Christianity by adopting its peculiar method and vindicating its supernatural validity. For this reason, the place he will permanently hold in history will by no means be that of "heresiarch," chief of heretics though he was to his own generation, but rather that of the last great champion of Christianity as the permanent religion of civilization, freedom, and progress. Other great preachers may arise in other sects to stand by his side; but they cannot go beyond him without going beyond Christianity. To abandon the method of intuition or faith is to pass the Rubicon—to cross over to ground where no man can long beguile himself with the hallucination that he is a Christian still: ground, moreover, where no man who cannot give up this method will ever be at home, or ever cease to be in a position from whose intellectual inconsistency and discomfort retreat is the only real escape.

Did Parker, then, make the final step of religious progress? No.

More than one step in advance has been taken in the fifteen years since Parker's death. The formation of the Free Religious Association, in 1867, marked the definite refusal to limit religious fellowship by Christian lines, or to limit the right of free thought by Christian creeds. By a vote of four judges to one, in the Dover church case, the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, in 1868, fixed the boundaries of Christianity as also those of Unitarian "free inquiry" and of Protestant liberty in general; it settled in the negative the question whether a "free religionist" can be legally either a Protestant or a Christian; and it thus helped to make clear the issue between Christianity and freedom. The action of the First Independent Society of Toledo, in 1869, marked a bold acceptance of this issue, and uttered the first explicit protest of a religious organization against Christianity in the name of spiritual freedom. The establishment of THE INDEX, in 1870, was a continuation of the same protest in a fuller, louder, and more emphatic manner; and that this protest has found a deep, living response in thousands of hearts all over this country, and also abroad, the readers of this paper know. For three cardinal ideas, so far as its editor alone is concerned, has THE INDEX stood through thick and thin for now five years:—

1. That Freedom and Christianity are fundamentally and irreconcilably antagonistic, and that whoever strikes a blow for the one strikes a blow against the other.

2. That Freedom and Religion are friends, and not foes, if Religion is the effort of Man to perfect himself; but that the two are foes, and not friends, if Religion insists on removing beyond scrutiny and discussion the great questions of God and Immortality, or any other question whatever.

3. That Freedom recognizes but one method of arriving at truth in all the departments of human thought, namely, the method of Science; and that the method of Faith, whether as exemplified by Catholicism or Protestantism, by Intuitionism, Transcendentalism, or any other phase of thought, denies the method of Science by excluding the human intellect from more or less of its own legitimate domain.

Such events and such ideas, however interesting or instructive to individuals, would be of little public value, if they were not symptomatic of a great and greating movement, and did not, in point of fact, indicate the drift of the whole modern world. They present issues far deeper than were raised in Parker's day; issues which impose new and onerous duties. The Christian religion and its Church stand arrayed against civilization, science, progress, freedom, truth, the higher ethics of Nature, the permanent and truest welfare of mankind; and this the world is fast finding out.

Radicals! Do you care for these supreme things? Do you, each in your own way, wish, purpose, or endeavor to advance the sublimest interests of your race? I know you do! Be assured, then, that I do not ask you to assume any new position towards Christianity. I do but tell you WHERE YOU ARE. I do but bid you open your eyes, and recognize the position in which, regardless of all private prejudices or preconceptions, you are necessarily placed by your own devotion to the higher thought and nobler spirit of this nineteenth century. I do but tell you that you are all anti-Christians because you are all friends to liberty and light, science and civilization, truth, brotherhood, and humanitarian religion, in all their magnificent universality. There is no need that I should ask you to be anti-Christians, for anti-Christians you are, in spite of all dreams to the contrary. What I ask is that you should recognize your own inevitable position; that you should perceive where you are; that you should come to consciousness of a fact which is not at all changed by unconsciousness of it, namely, that devotion to freedom makes us all anti-Christians in spite of ourselves, and leaves us no method but that of science in the determination of truth. There is great intellectual and moral gain to ourselves, and great increase of usefulness to the world at large, in opening our eyes to the realities of things and breaking the spell of a mental delusion that paralyzes courage, deadens conscience, and darkens the eye of reason. I do not ask you to be anti-Christian; that you are, as Rome, the Imperial City of Christianity, sees and declares. But I do ask you to shake off the enchantment that blinds so many of you, to see where you are, and to bear brave, public testimony to the truth you cannot annihilate by shutting your eyes or your mouths. I do ask you to rise to the height of the occasion, and pledge yourselves, despite all sacrifices, to plant the flag of Spiritual Freedom on the dome of the Capitol of this great country. THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM and the RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT, are just, pacific, and right; they boldly declare what is still needed to make America consistently and completely free in conscience and intellect; they point out the grave public duty that rests upon you all, as custodians of the American idea in its sublimest applications. I ask you to be not niggardly of time, money, exertion, in this great cause of man. I ask you to trample indifference, sluggishness, cowardice, self-interest, mental and moral blindness, under your heels, and to press forward as one man to the consummation of Freedom's grandest hope. Do you wait till the movement shall start up spontaneously among the mentally enslaved, and be made "popular" by the advocacy of the churches? Then you must wait forever. Know that this movement must spring from you; and I summon you to the duty of to-day all the more that it is "unpopular"—all the more that it entails self-sacrifice, loss, commotion, pain of heart and strain of will. Perish the pettiness that counts the cost only to evade it—long live the heroism that counts it coolly to pay it ten times over! For two years I have urged this great public duty of radicalism; to-day I believe in it more than ever. Not a jot of determination have I lost by partial failure; I appeal to you with greater earnestness than ever. Sooner or later this cause must ride to triumph; shall it be with you or over you?

JOURNALISM UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

The Philadelphia Christian Statesman enlarges on the "Hard Times for Newspapers," and says: "Publishers feel the pressure of financial difficulties sooner than those who minister to the lower, even the lowest, wants of human nature; and it is a matter of congratulation to the friends of any publishing enterprise, when in times like these it is able to keep on its feet. . . . It will require the utmost diligence, promptness, and faithfulness on the part of all who love the paper and its cause, to carry it safely through the extreme embarrassments which are now pressing upon the country."

The New York Christian Union says: "While the Christian Union has, in common with all other periodicals, felt the effects of last year's business panic, it has excellent reason to believe that it has been exceptionally favored in the large proportion of subscribers retained; and to those who look at present facts for indications of the effect of the Brooklyn trouble, we are happy to state that the paper is making a net gain in subscribers, week by week, while the result of the year's business shows a very large profit."

The New York Christian Advocate says: "The past year or two have been especially hard on religious newspapers, many of which have suffered financially, and some of which, as well as secular papers, have suspended. A certain Baptist paper, with a bona fide circulation of 7,500, has during the last few years fallen, by its own showing, seriously behind in its finances. The editor announces that the subscriptions and the business have failed by ten thousand dollars to pay expenses, and that 'another four years of such failure' would put the concern from twenty to thirty thousand dollars in debt—an obligation the denomination could never meet. The Religious Herald tells us that another Baptist paper, with 8,000 subscribers, failed last year to pay expenses by five thousand dollars. The last two years have been years of embarrassment to all enterprises whose business is readily affected by a financial crisis."

The Reformed Church Messenger adds this comment to the foregoing: "We can sympathize with the editorial brethren referred to in the above paragraph. During our thirty-four years' connection with the religious press, we have at no time passed through as trying an ordeal as that which has fallen to our lot during the last year and a half."

To these testimonies THE INDEX adds its own. It has had more than the average share of difficulties to contend with during the past two years, demanding thought, strength, and time that could ill be spared from higher than business interests; but it has triumphed over them all, and to-day, thanks to the steadfast devotion and generosity of its friends, is in a better financial condition than ever before. But this cheering result has not been attained without losses of various kinds; and, without the continued aid of those who are determined that the most radical journal of the country shall be sustained in spite of all opposition, THE INDEX cannot hope to keep its flag flying in the van-guard of progress. Any diminution in the zeal of its supporters would imperil all that has been won at so much sacrifice in so many quarters. Every one who knows the importance of the ideas it promulgates should resolve to be staunch in its support, and slacken not a whit in rendering the assistance which is indispensable to it. As it begins the second half-decade of its existence, may it not appeal with confidence to the brave band that have rallied around it, and count with stronger faith than ever before on their fidelity and unselfishness? Not a subscriber now should withhold the small amount of his annual subscription; not a stockholder should grow weary of well-doing in the cause of truth and freedom for which so much has been already accomplished. "Faithful unto the end"—let that be the watchword alike of THE INDEX and of its friends!

ANOTHER WITNESS AGAINST SECTARIANISM.

Rev. W. S. Bell, who has been preaching for the Universalist society in New Bedford during the past year, announced in his sermon on the last Sunday of the year, that he felt himself compelled to leave the Universalist denomination, and all the sectarian organizations of Christendom, in order that he might enjoy the privilege of free investigation into truth, and of free utterance of what his reason declared to be truth. This was no sudden impulse with him, but a point which he had been for some time nearing. He had felt for several months that he was outgrowing the limitations of his pulpit, and that the society rather repelled than invited the free utterance of his thought; and hence, without any contest with them, he quietly withdraws, and from the denomination at the same time.

Mr. Bell graduated from the Divinity School at Cambridge in 1872. Previous to his entering the school there, he had been a recognized preacher among the Methodists; and it was while he was thus preaching that his views first started out of the grooves of the old creeds. After leaving his studies at Cambridge, he felt that he should be more at home and find a more congenial fellowship among Universalists than among Unitarians; and he was accordingly regularly accredited as a minister in the Universalist body. But, like many another man who, after reaching maturity, has once begun to migrate from his Orthodox homestead, he has found no stopping-place in the liberal sects of Christendom. Thought once awakened is inexorable in its demands, and is a foe to sectarianism in any of its forms.

But Mr. Bell does not wish to give up the ministry. In one form he feels, indeed, more called to it than ever. Having felt the chains of dogmatism, having experienced the paralyzing effect of a sectarian ministry upon the intellect, he burns with zeal to proclaim the glad tidings of an emancipated religion. Wherever there is a free pulpit or a free platform, he will willingly utter his word. And liberals in religion should give him a cordial welcome and hearing. He is a man of varied experience, a good thinker, and a good speaker. Whatever society or committee may engage him as a speaker will find that he is a man who has something to say, and can say it vigorously.

LARGE AND SMALL FAMILIES.

Carl Schurz has been lecturing recently in Massachusetts upon "Educational Problems," and it has been my good fortune to hear him. When it is considered that Mr. Schurz is a member of the United States Senate, and at present its noblest and brightest ornament; that for many years he has been engaged actively and prominently in political life, cherishing the highest though most honorable political ambitions,—it becomes a striking and impressive fact that he should turn aside from all that so much involves his immediate personal interests, and, forgetting the politician in the philanthropist, should give his mind to the consideration of a social question like that of education, which really involves the most vital welfare of American society. Not even Mr. Sumner, during all his political career, found time or inclination to discuss so practical a subject, evincing little or no interest in social questions of any kind, but devoting himself, almost exclusively, with the most determined perseverance and splendid consistency, to elevating the negroes of this country to an equality before the law with every other citizen,—an achievement, I freely admit, well worthy the whole mental and moral energies of the great and lamented senator of Massachusetts. At the same time, I none the less rejoice that Carl Schurz, while nobly seconding the political labors of Charles Sumner, has the wisdom to perceive that there are no questions more important than the social questions,—including the elevation of all women as well as all men, the dignifying, exalting, and reassuring of the best home and love life, the expediency and necessity of considering how every man, woman, and child may be most truly and most wisely educated,—and is willing to go about the country, speaking an hour and a half in the most simple, sensible, plain, and at the same time engaging and charming manner to such audiences as will gather to listen to and be instructed by him. God bless his manly, tender heart and his honest, able mind, and lead our American people to see that, foreigner as he is, they have no better or more faithful friend than Carl Schurz!

Yet Mr. Schurz undoubtedly disappoints some, in that he discusses the subject of education, not in what may be considered its broadest and most philosophical bearings, but rather in its practical and domestic aspects. Indeed, I found myself querying whether he has altogether the best idea, the one perhaps most likely to commend itself at last, of the true sphere and function of woman. The lecturer takes the Old World and especially the German view of this matter; and while he is to be credited with the most respectful, gentle, and even chivalrous and admiring disposition towards woman, being in favor, as I understand, of granting to her every privilege and advantage to which her individual or sex capacity would seem to him to entitle her,—he at the same time appears to regard the sphere of the "average woman" to be that exclusively of home, and her function in society exclusively that of wife and mother. Mr. Schurz emphatically deprecates the tendency in this country to non-marriage and to small families. He considers it the highest possible felicity, dignity, and usefulness of woman to be married, to become the mother of many children and the "queen of the home." In the sphere of domesticity, and by the function of wife and mother, the lecturer believes that woman can achieve her highest mission, and do her best work for herself and for humanity. And he argues that, in general, education for woman should be of such a nature as to prepare her for the private destiny of wifehood and motherhood, and for the æsthetic and moral government of the home, rather than for any public station or work.

With the opinions in the main of Mr. Schurz upon the natural destiny of woman I do not find myself essentially disagreeing, although he gives less consideration to the provision for the large number of exceptional cases than I could wish. It is from his views as to the general desirableness of large families and a rapidly increasing population that I especially differ; for herein do I find the most probable reconciliation between the claims of womanhood on the one hand, and those of wifehood and motherhood on the other. And right here let me say that, in the very nature of the case, man is not so good a judge of the desirableness of large families as woman is. The burden of having and rearing many children comes not heaviest on man but on woman. The mother is nearer in every way to her children than is the father. Aside from the terrible tragedy of giving birth to them,—which momentous event alone visits her experience, not his,—she, better than he, knows and feels all their wants, sorrows, trials, perils, and the tremendous responsibility of meeting and caring for these. Let woman, then, rather than man, settle this question. Hers only be it the office to decide how many children she shall have, and whether large or small families are desirable. And, in presuming to speak at all upon this subject, it is with the desire to voice the mind of woman so far as I know it, more even than to call attention to the rights of the children themselves, or to those of society at large.

I have two principal objections to the rule of large families. In the first place I believe they help to perpetuate poverty, which is one of the chief causes of ignorance and crime. If only those who are well-to-do in life, who have ample means to properly educate and care for numerous children,—if only such would have large families comparatively little might be found to say against it. In such cases, the burden could not come heavily on either mother or father, and the children (providing always the parents were wise) would be reared in such a way as to find their own lives worth having and capable of being put to good service for humanity. A large family is a beautiful sight to contemplate, when the parents are not bowed down with the load of providing for it, and when all the children are healthy and happy, each being able to have a fair chance and reasonable advantage in life. But it so happens that not the wealthier but the poorer classes are most prolific of offspring. The poverty-steeped couples are those who indulge most in large families. Behold how children thicken like flies in the midst of squalor and dirt! Behold how they swarm in unventilated tenement houses, in dingy huts and hovels, on unwholesome marsh-lands, and in the uncomfortable homes of peasants and day-laborers and our poorer farmers! Nine times out of ten, in such cases, the children are unwelcome to both father and mother; and yet, through no fault of theirs, the pitiable little things keep coming into an existence which one half of them learn to deplore if not to curse. The parents are as unhappy as the children. They would avoid these sad results,—the having of children whom they cannot provide for, and whose increasing number plunge the whole family into deeper want and more fierce despair,—if they knew how. Ought not the education which society provides for them to be of such a nature that every married couple shall be intelligent propagators of their race, and wise enough to choose and regulate the number of their offspring? I religiously believe that it should be a self-imposed law upon all married men and women (in my view society has no other right in this matter than to instruct,—it has none to coerce) not to have any more offspring than they can, with equal justice to themselves and the children, provide for. When this comes to be the rule, we shall have a healthier and happier population, and a better world every way.

My second objection to large families is that in so many cases they ensure the discomfort, the distress, and the actual degradation of the mother. Marriage will never be an honorable and pure sacrament of Nature, until it utterly ceases to involve the sacrifice of womanhood to wifehood and motherhood. A woman is a woman before she is a wife and a mother; and she ought never to be asked, and never should allow herself, to become the latter at any expense of the former. Better she should remain forever unwed and unmothered, than to make marriage in any degree the grave of her womanhood! Better that we should have no more children born, and that the race of man should become extinct, than that any woman should ever be an unwilling mother, or should hinder or prevent her freest and fullest development as a woman by her function as child-bearer!

But in how many cases of large families is this the sad result to woman! By becoming fathers, men comparatively little are prevented from going forth into the world and seeking and obtaining all their rights and privileges as men; but women, by becoming mothers, are much prevented from doing all this for themselves. Every birth of a child makes them a prisoner in the home for a longer or shorter time; and, although they gladly endure what deprivation is consequent upon motherhood, when motherhood is a matter of their own choice, yet if it be imposed upon them, or indeed be too often chosen by themselves, the loss all round is more than the gain,—for, without the completest development of womanhood, both motherhood and childhood must be incomplete. If we could take the census of all the pale-faced, sad-eyed, soul-cramped women who are groaning in secret under the burden of too much child-bearing, we should be surprised at the large army of martyrs who would rise up to pronounce against the desirableness of large families. In this case, if in no other, let us be wise, and collect the suffrages of women before we consider the question settled.

FREE-THOUGHT NOTES.

BY A VETERAN ENGLISH FREE-THINKER.

MR. EDITOR:—

At this time I am as blind as Homer, without his power of singing. An accidental cold has brought that disablement, so that I am in a worse position than those described by Paul who are said to see through a glass darkly. I am not able to see through a glass at all. Nor have I yet recovered from a sharp illness in which I had reason to suppose I should have a precipitate opportunity of finding out what had become of my forefathers, if that be a discoverable thing. They have certainly never attempted to make a communication with me; which is a comfort in these days, when so many noisy and discontented persons are, in the opinion of many estimable people, endeavoring to make their way back again into this world, to the injury of our furniture, the confusion of our grammar, and the depravation of our taste. Under such circumstances it is a source of consolation that one's ancestors preserve dignity and reticence.

The pleasure I experience in accepting the invitation you do me the honor of giving me, of contributing to THE INDEX, arises from the opportunity it will afford me of reporting upon generally unknown or unnoticed features of free thought in England to readers in America, and explaining to them the nature, peculiarities, and diversities of that movement here.

If they are half as curious to understand the features of English free thought as I am to learn those of America, the story may often interest them. International communication of opinion and progress is as important to the advancement of the public understanding, as international trade is to the increase of the wealth and happiness of nations.

THE "EXCHANGE OF OPINION."

Many years ago I joined with Thornton Leigh

Hunt, the son of Leigh Hunt, the poet, in a project which we had both much at heart; which was to establish an Exchange of Opinion, corresponding to the Exchange so familiar to commerce. We arranged to issue a journal to be called The Exchange, which was to be open absolutely to all opinion that was vital in its nature, useful in application, intelligible and fair in statement. For many years Thornton, as his friends familiarly called him, meditated publishing what he had in part composed, a work on the Advisability of Debating Undebatable Questions, which really meant social questions that were never debated. But the incessant exigencies of journalism which occupied his fertile and sagacious brain exhausted his life, as they have done that of so many other men of genius, before they were able to execute that upon which they had chiefly set their hearts.

For myself, I carried out the plan farther than it ever had been carried in the organization of Secular Propaganda, which I commenced in 1853. We had in Richard Carlile a militant free-thinker, as stout and invincible as Peter Annet. Richard Carlile's name was so widely known in England that Thomas Carlyle, long after he became famous, was frequently confounded with him. Richard Carlile underwent more than nine years' imprisonment in vindication of the right to publish opinion, whether atheistical or republican. He was the first man in this century who brought absolute free thought into the front streets of London. He had a business shop (which you would call a store) in Fleet Street, the great city thoroughfare through which everybody visiting London passes. His bravery brought him munificent friends. One day he was visited in prison by Julien Hibbert, a man of mark in many ways. Hearing that a political prisoner in the same jail, of some merit, had been presented with one thousand pounds that morning, Hibbert at once said to Carlile, "A free thought prisoner should not stand on lower ground than a political one, and I will give you a thousand pounds;" and he left the check with him for the amount. Carlile, in honorable devotion, expended whatever came into his hands in the advancement of his opinions, and he established the place of their publication in the great thoroughfare which marked their ascendancy.

When I came into the movement, I heard continual regrets that free thought could not reappear in that street from which it had many years been banished. Dr. Chapman, the present editor of the Westminster Review, had a shop of some importance in Newgate Street, opposite the jail, not far from the drop. Mr. Watson, the chief free thought bookseller next to Chapman, had his shop in Queen's Head Passage, leading out of the same Newgate Street; so that adversaries of these opinions used to say to young men, "If you want to get into Newgate, you need not begin so near the jail to buy your books."

The house I held at 147 Fleet Street, I fitted up with costly conveniences for inquirers and visitors. We kept lists and published catalogues of all the free thought works—communist, cooperative, and republican—of which we could hear, giving the price of the books, and names of the publishers. The sale we promoted was of no business advantage to us, and the publicity we gave was expensive; but our object was the diffusion of liberal opinion. In the Reasoner, which was the organ of the house, we advertised without charge whatever free thought works appeared, printing accounts of them, and sending them to all our connections. We knew that free thought writers would have small chance of meeting with remunerative sale, and we held it to be the duty of an organized party to promote that by every means in our power, so that it might become the interest of gentlemen to write, certain that at one house they would receive a voluntary and persevering publicity. Some authors now popular in America, and no longer needing any man's aid, would acknowledge the ardor with which we endeavored to extend their names in their unknown days. Any one coming from the country to London, or coming to England from any part of the world, found at our Exchange a place where they could have letters addressed to them, be put into communication with many whom they wanted to see, and receive information about whatever was known of free thought, or cooperation, or political movements. This they could do without feeling that they interrupted business; for we made it part of our business to afford them these facilities. From every part of the world inquirers came. It was the first time and the last that any such institution has existed.

We were tolerably cosmopolitan in our efforts. When the Conspiracy Bill was introduced into Parliament by Lord Palmerston, at the instigation of the late Emperor of the French, the committee that organized the great opposition to it which defeated the bill and overthrew Lord Palmerston met in our rooms. The soldiers who went out to fight for Garibaldi in Italy thronged our house for days together. The committee which sent out the British Legion met there. The appliances of the house were always at the command of Mazzini, who publicly contributed to the columns of the Reasoner in acknowledgment of those services. The last publication of unstamped papers made in order to procure the repeal of the stamp duty was made at our house. The amount of fines I incurred by doing it was six hundred thousand pounds! When called upon in the Courts of Exchequer to pay, I had to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (who was then Mr. Gladstone) to take it weekly, as I had not that sum by me. He had the courtesy to say that he knew our object was not to break, but to try, the law. The bad law was shortly after repealed, and the fines were never asked for.

THE PRINCIPLES ON WHICH THE "EXCHANGE" WAS ESTABLISHED.

How this Exchange of Opinion came to be closed,

I may briefly tell another time, if likely to be interesting; but what I will tell now is the nature of those principles of Secularism for which this institution was established, and which this Catholic organization was intended to illustrate and maintain. We feared no man's frown. We courted no man's favor except by public service. We were deterred by no man's opinion. We gave the freest publicity to well-expressed conviction on all sides of every question. Our constant calculation was, not what would meet the views of individuals who thought only of expressing their personal and passionate feelings, but what would contribute to the good reputation of the cause in the eyes of adversaries.

No man is justified in occupying public attention because what he says is true. Out of all that is true, he is bound to restrict himself to that which is useful and relevant. It is wonderful how few propagandists consider what will be the effect on their cause, in the eyes of the public, of the expression of their opinion.

Thus we established in England new forms of free thought. They made a distinct impression upon the religious world, as may be seen from a passage in the Rev. Nassau Molesworth's History of England, which Mr. Bright lately commended, and from the article on "Secularism" in Chamber's Encyclopædia.

GLADSTONE AND COLENSO.

But I do not forget that I am to tell you of events current as well as retrospective.

Ecclesiasticism now fills the air. Mr. Gladstone, by his book on the Vatican Decrees, has disturbed Rome more than it has been disturbed by any one man since the days of Luther. More than one hundred thousand copies have already been issued, and the demand for them is seven thousand a day.

We have a larger proportion than is right of silly bishops in this country. The Bishop of Lincoln lately prohibited a Wesleyan minister from identifying his own daughter on her tomb-stone; so that the selecting angel, when he comes down, will not know where to find her.

The Bishop of Oxford has been inhibiting a much greater bishop than himself—Bishop Colenso—from preaching in his diocese. As you have heard, the bishop did not preach, but his sermon was delivered all the same. Professor Jowett, the Master of Balliol, entertained the bishop, and gave him his church to preach in, where crowded congregations, larger than the capacity of the church to hold, thronged to hear him. The corporation of Oxford placed any of the city buildings that might suit him at the Bishop of Natal's disposal, and he became the lion of Oxford; half the population seemed disposed to go to Heaven on the Colenso track. It is stated that the Dean of Westminster had invited the bishop to preach in Westminster Abbey; and the Rev. Stopford Brooke, one of the Queen's chaplains, a preacher of great originality and boldness, has invited him to preach in his church in York Street, St. James Square, within a few yards of the residence of Lord Derby, who would probably hear the bishop himself with pleasure.

THE DEATH OF JAMES WATSON.

We have buried this week, at the Norwood Cemetery, one whose honorable name was known to some in every part of America, Mr. James Watson, the radical and free-thought publisher, whose name I have mentioned above. He was not only a courageous publisher in the evil days when publishing new opinions was a penal offence, but also a man of that strong integrity which impresses itself upon all who come in contact with it; and, what is more, in the publications which he issued and in the manner of conducting his business, he never lost sight of the reputation of the cause which he represented. He lent to it the lustre of his sound judgment and unspotted name. As early as 1827, he was imprisoned for publishing forbidden knowledge in Leeds. In 1830, in the first great fervor of cooperation, he was the second cooperative missionary appointed. When Richard Carlile's shopmen were being imprisoned (more than five hundred of them were imprisoned altogether), James Watson was one of the young and brave volunteers who came up from Lancashire, and took Carlile's place at his counter, and his place in prison on three occasions. The terms of incarceration extended over six months in some cases. On one occasion he was imprisoned for walking in a procession on a fast day. He maintained that it was necessary for the poor to keep the day as a feast day, if they could; and that it was hypocrisy to attempt to appease Heaven by fasting, whilst political and social injustice remained in force. He maintained the publication of free-thought works until the business passed into my hands, on going into Fleet Street.

In the great political movements of his time, he aided by counsel, by speech, and by manful service, and died well stricken in years and in great regard. He was buried in the consecrated part of the cemetery, Mr. Conway speaking at his grave. As I had spoken in 1849 at the grave of his friend, fellow-publisher, and fellow-prisoner, Henry Hetherington, it was the wish of his family that I should speak at Mr. Watson's grave; but my illness rendered it impossible.

Watson, Hetherington, and Cleave were the three great radical publishers whose names were known throughout England. Mr. Cleave was father-in-law of Mr. Henry Vincent, a lecturer now well known in America. These three publishers, who represented a historic period in the freedom of publication, have all passed away.

What I have said is written by a friendly hand, and I must trust to the pen of a friendly editor to revise it, being unable to see a line that is written.

Your dimmed but faithful friend,

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

DRESS REFORM. Edited by Abba Gould Woolson. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1875.

This book is the summing up of the wisest things that have been said upon the subject of Dress Reform. It includes the lectures that were given by the women physicians of Boston, and others, two winters ago, with an appendix of fifty pages from the brilliant pen of Mrs. Woolson. The book is for sale in all the principal stores, and it is not a little amusing to watch its reception into this sharp-eyed world. We said to Louisa Alcott, the other day, "Have you read it?" "Yes; saw it in the proof." "Do you like it?" "I think it is the most sensible book I ever read." "Then it will sell," we replied. "Ah, I can't tell about that," was the answer; "good books do not always sell."

Men do not read the book, but they read women who have read it, and get their opinion of its worth from them. They rise and fall in their estimate according as the wife and daughter at home render their verdict. One can easily guess the tightness of a woman's corsets in these days by asking her husband what he thinks of the "Dress Reform" book. So, it is a woman's book entirely; and the men are left to stand on the outskirts with their hands in their pockets, whilst the women prouette about it.

As dress reforming has been going on some time, the women who have been in the ranks, or been within sight or hearing, or who have read to any extent the woman question, have become a good deal leavened by it. Consequently, they are quite well prepared for what Dr. Safford Blake tells them in her admirable lecture: that "uniformity of temperature is desirable;" that when any portion of the body becomes unduly heated for a long period of time, congestion of that part is liable to follow. They are convinced that the "thoracic region" should not be "encased in six to ten thicknesses," whilst the feet have only one. They have some respect for the "solar plexus," and are inclined to make friends with the "central glandular organs;" though the doctor frightens us all anew at the fearful account she gives of the autopsy of several women she has attended, in whom the organs were found in an abnormal and atrophied condition caused by tight lacing. All the more we are alarmed, for we know the doctor to be the most earnest, truthful, searching, little woman in the world; and what she says is gospel as well as scientific truth. One would no more dare to go to her with an adverse opinion than one would venture to put one's head into a dissecting room itself; for nobody ever knows what awful proof the doctor is going to bring forward. We finish reading her lecture with a long breath, striving to lengthen out our corset-strings a little; for they never seemed quite so snug before.

But, we hear some one say, do women who have studied physiology, and seen a female skeleton and counted its ribs, and heard of the "solar plexus," still wear corsets? Oh, yes; to be sure they do; not, of course, the real French ones, fully ribbed, but substitutes,—such as Madame Foye's and the "Comfort Corset." Why, it will take more physiologies, more dress reformers and dress-reform books, to get women out of corsets, than all the wisdom, scholars, and philosophies put together that the world has ever furnished to advance any half-dozen of its greatest scientific or metaphysical schemes. Gravitation, or the "Unknowable," is nothing compared with it. A woman might know her heart was being squeezed up into her mouth, and her lungs down into her boots, and she would not forsake her idol.

Only this morning we took up a journal, and read a review of this book by the pen of a very able woman, who stands up for corsets, and defends hip-bones versus shoulders, with all her magic skill. At the same time, there is a class of critics of this dress reform, whose corseted appearance renders it easy to conjecture that an autopsy in their case might reveal some displacement of organs, some congestion of tissues, and an infinite amount of discomfort. But to leave their corsets, in which they were born and bred, would be like forsaking their native country, and shipping themselves to dwell forever among the Fijis.

We pass on to the second lecture, by Dr. Hastings. We stop longest at the chapter describing the bony framework of the body and the organs it encompasses. A good illustration of a perfectly-developed human skeleton occupies one entire page, and a corset-manufactured skeleton another. So those who will not read can look at the pictures, and see what ought to be, and what now is.

Dr. Jackson's lecture should have great weight, not only from its convincing arguments, but from the clinical observation of many years' practice. She puts in a word for the tiny babies, against their being wound up in trailing dresses which forbid the motion of their little feet; and pleads that they may never be exposed in low necks and short sleeves. The close-fitting shoe and high heel are severely condemned. "They not only cause contraction of the muscles of the leg, so great in some instances as to make surgical separation of them necessary, but by inclining the body forward they throw the uterus out of its normal position, and oblige the ligaments that are designed to steady it to remain constantly in action, in order to restore it to its proper place."

The fourth lecture, by Dr. Haynes, is strictly scientific and physiological, and cannot be read too carefully. It shows clearly what functions different organs perform, and how they encroach one upon the other, when subject to external pressure and unequal weight. She allows no possible escape for the fearful sins that corset-bones commit. She brings so clearly to light the causes resulting from impeded circulation, abdominal pressure, and cold feet, that the biggest dunce of a woman cannot fail to comprehend, if she will.

Mrs. Woolson's lecture considers especially the æsthetic and artistic department of dress. Her queenly pen moves through the absurd fashions of the day with a mighty sweep of truth and justice. She introduces the beautiful forms of the Greek women clad in graceful draperies flowing from the shoulders, and sets them by the side of our feeble, corseted, panniered American women, to the infinite glory of the former and the eternal disgrace of the latter. She is a devotee at the shrine of Beauty as well as Health, and would have these goddesses go forth hand in hand. But, if they cannot be united, she would hold grand carnival seasons when men as well as women should worship in Beauty's temple, adorned with all the soft tints of the sky, and bedecked with all the splendor of jewels and feathers. She says: "Our hungry senses would have had a carnival of color and movement, of courtly grace and beaming compliment, managed according to the most approved cooperative principles, where each one who shared the profits had contributed his proportion of the risks."

The elegant, graceful, and instructive material of some portions of this lecture renders them worthy of being bound up with the best writers of classical lore. Were the title some grand, poetic theme, instead of the homely "Dress Reform" that it is, the style could scarcely be more rich and inspiring. One certainly feels inclined to wear loose clothes all hanging from the shoulders, if for no other reason than to be in the company of such an accomplished writer.

Farther on comes the appendix of fifty pages, which really is the arithmetic of the book. Mrs. Woolson warns her readers at the outset that she means business here,—button-holes, chemiloons, and shoulder-straps; and not a repast of diverting literature. In the main she is true to her word, though never before did the English language display such pages of button-holes and suspenders served up in such graphic and vivid terms. This is the most trying time for her artistic pen; but the skill with which she handles it, clear through to the closing sentence, is a marvel to behold. She sits down with scissors and needle in hand, and cuts out, fits, and makes up an entire wardrobe of under-wear for woman, right before our eyes; so that a woman in New Zealand or the interior of Africa, of ordinary intelligence, could take this book and fit herself up in hygienic garments exactly like the ones approved by the writer. It might be called a dress-reform recipe, originating in the brain of the author; and, having been tested by herself and found satisfactory, she sends it forth for the world.

God bless her work, say all of us who have been induced to accept even a few of her ideas, and put them into practice! We know how blessed a thing it is to breathe a little easier; to walk in broad-soled "Miller's boots," and to bear the burdens of life on our shoulders, where they were intended to be put, instead of on our hips.

This book will make its way slowly into the work-boxes of women. Many will read it and turn up their noses; some will toss it aside; others will ridicule it. But, as surely as the old Hebrew Bible was destined to make its way down the ages, so surely Dress Reform is to become the most vital question that ever stirred a nation of women. Corsets are doomed to everlasting oblivion, and woman's body is approaching its day of freedom.

THE PERMANENCE OF TRUTH.

The quotation from Prof. Tyndall's lecture on "Crystalline and Molecular Forces," published in THE INDEX of November 19, contains some beautiful and courageous sentiments which should inspire all earnest seekers of truth with a higher faith in the legitimacy of their pursuit, and banish those weak fears that would obstruct the road to future knowledge. We dread the results of free thought, the conclusions of new theories, as though the universe had no firmer foundation than our puny belief. Nature is not convulsed to her centre by the errors that prevail for a time in the progress of human knowledge. The sun did not shine less benignly on our little planet during the long ages when a false system of astronomy assigned him the arduous duties of serving the earth as a dependent satellite. The globe which we inhabit does not quake when scientists probe its fossil secrets, lest the ancient theory of its creation be doubted. Truth is enthroned on an indestructible basis, and can endure the petty misconceptions of men, waiting for the slow evolution of light in this sphere of intelligence to reveal her more clearly to the eyes of mortals.

Truly has Prof. Tyndall said that our fears of scientific investigation reveal a secret scepticism in our own minds. A profound, intelligent faith in the PERMANENCE OF TRUTH has no fears of free thought and scientific research. There is no danger of robbing human nature of its virtues, though every dogma of popular religious belief should be crushed. The excellences of the human character are too real, too self-rewarding, to be abandoned for the baser gratifications of a mere selfish life, though the whole fabric of ancient theology should crumble under the tread of science. Human love and sympathy will not lose their warmth and tenderness, though the progress of free thought make devastating inroads on our religious belief. The wonder and reverence that the discovery of new truths has always inspired in the soul of man will not fail to accompany the acquisition of future knowledge; nor will hope and aspiration cease to look beyond the realities of the acquired to the ideals of the unattained.

A GLIMPSE OF A SOUL'S TRIALS AND HOPE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 27, 1874.

F. E. ABBOT:

My Friend.—A few weeks since you published in THE INDEX a letter of mine, in response to some questions from a correspondent, one of your Western subscribers, and an occasional contributor. The extracts below from his letter to me, just received, may be of interest, as they show that the religion of humanity has its philanthropy, and illustrate the cruelty of a bigotry which has too long blighted and darkened our fair world. He writes:—

"I have read your letter in THE INDEX, and wish to thank you for your kindness in considering my inquiries. Orthodox people frequently charge sceptics with selfishness; say they have no soul; are misanthropic; hence do not, in their intercourse with their fellows, cultivate that sentiment of fraternal love which is felt by every true Christian. Such kindness as I have received from those of the heretical faith convinces me that there is soul, endowed with all the noble attributes of a pure and benignant humanity, in the wonderful religious reformation that is now progressing in our midst. I have been reared under 'Orthodox' influences—have never been beyond the constant preaching of the Christian Church in any of my associations during my life; and I have never felt that assurance of sympathy, that confidence of receiving a response of natural, human love from intimate acquaintances of the Orthodox belief, that I have in writing to persons of the heretical school whom I have never seen. I am a lover of the 'religion of the heart,' and am always looking for the spirit behind the actions and expressions of those with whom I come in contact either through personal associations or the remoter relation of their writings; and I am gladly convinced that freethinkers are not deficient in the sentiment of philanthropy which some Christians claim to be peculiar to their faith. Faith in man is broadening with the constant evolution of knowledge, and the beautiful and holy 'Religion of Humanity,' deep and lofty as the wonderful, complex nature of the human soul, is beginning to be revealed in the ever-brightening future, to those who can read the prophecies of the present. Some are more richly endowed with the gift that looks beyond the material environment to the more permanent realities of human destiny than others. Such may not know the agonizing experience of their less favored brothers, who see through a more sombre veil from this habitation of the flesh. I am happy to know that there are souls that never doubt that the deep, earnest longings for a more perfect life than this, which man in every age has felt, will be satisfied. I have been associated with Christians all my life, who of course were committed by their creed to this doctrine of immortality; but many such, I knew, accepted this belief passively, and had only blind credulity instead of deep conviction. A firm belief in this glorious destiny of the soul from one who has thought outside of the limits of dogmatism which the Church prescribes gives me more confidence. . . . I have struggled alone in my exodus from the belief of my friends into the boundless theories of free thought. No sympathizing companion has cheered the gloom of this journey of doubt. Under the constant anathemas of the devotees of the Orthodox belief, I have plodded along my solitary way, seeking a faith more satisfactory to the demands of my reason and more congenial to the aspirations of my soul. We all need sympathy and encouragement in the battle of life, and especially do we need the aid of loving companionship in the trying struggle that we experience in passing from the venerated religion that holds the dear associations of childhood, that still represents the honest faith of our fond parents and sisters, to a new and denounced form of religious belief which has no traditional oracles on which the weary, doubt-burdened soul can repose."

Surely such trials as are here spoken of should be incentives to that charity which "hopeth all things," and which sectarian bigotry knows not of.

G. B. STEBBINS.

IN NASHUA, N. H., resides a young girl whose pitiful lot excites the deepest sympathy, yet for whom sympathy can do but little in alleviation of the sad misfortune which has darkened her life. When a child she was terribly scalded about the head and face, and although she survived her injuries, she was thenceforth disfigured for life, and the rosy face of childhood was changed to a mask—a travesty on the human countenance—absolutely frightful in its hideousness. In Lowell, Mass., where she once lived, so great was the horror excited by her appearance that she was forbidden by the authorities to show herself on the streets. At Nashua she ventured out the other day, and several ladies fainted at sight of her, and a call is now made upon the authorities of that place to forbid her appearance upon the streets. What a mournful fate is hers—to live through the terrible physical suffering only to endure henceforward a keener mental anguish in the knowledge that she is a thing of horror, to be abhorred and shunned by human kind, with no hope in the future except the grave, which shall hide her deformities from the gaze of her fellow-beings.

REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———.

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

For List of Liberal Leagues, see next page.

GLIMPSES.

IN another column will be found a statement showing that a witness in one of the New York courts has just been denied the right to give testimony because of his religious opinions. It should be read thoughtfully by every one.

IT is greatly to be desired that Carl Schurz shall be reelected to the United States Senate. We did not go with him in 1872, and think he made then a great mistake; but he is very able and very honest, and those are precisely the qualities that the country cannot spare just now.

COME what may, the executive department must not be suffered to dictate to the legislative department, at any time, in any place, for any reason. The soldiery must not be permitted to lift so much as a finger against the representatives of the people. On this point there must be no wavering, or all liberty is lost. Against the doubtless well-meant, but most dangerous usurpation of President Grant, every lover of constitutional government and republican institutions must make a determined protest.

CONGRESS itself is to blame for the Louisiana troubles. Its neglect to act in the past has provoked them. But military interference with State Legislatures is altogether too dangerous to be tolerated for a moment. This is eminently a time to keep cool and pass no snap-judgments. Declamation is not what is wanted, but clear comprehension of fundamental principles. On the one hand, no forcible revolution; on the other, no military despotism. Partisanship should be silent, and enlightened patriotism only heard.

IN THE preface to the third Edition of his Limits of Religious Thought, Dean Mansel defends "Christian Evidences" as "surely sufficient to form an ample field for the use of Reason, even in regard to those mysteries which it cannot directly examine," and refers slightly to the demands of the scientific intellect for investigation of all things as "the sharp-sightedness of little souls." In similar manner Christianity has depreciated intellect or reason from the beginning; but to-day the contemned faculty is terribly revenging itself on its contemner. Science is the work of the intellect, and science is grinding the "Evidences of Christianity" to powder.

THE Louisiana imbroglio is deeply to be regretted; but it is not yet clear at present writing where the wrong chiefly lies. The most contradictory statements have been made, and we cannot see our way clear to a knowledge of the facts. President Grant and General Sheridan are doubtless patriotic in their intentions; but the people must insist on knowing the facts. Armed interference with State governments is to be tolerated only in a state of war; and if war or secret rebellion exists at the South, it is high time to know it. Vigilance, jealousy for freedom, and determined protection of the equal rights of all, are eminently needed just now.

NOTHING so much tends to cool off all sympathy with the opponents of the Kellogg government as the late collective manifestoes on their behalf by clergymen and prelates, as such, in Louisiana and Arkansas; nothing excites so strong a suspicion that the real animus of that party is the old pro-slavery spirit of the past, breaking out in a new form as a determination to keep the negroes still under foot. The Church was the bulwark of slavery; it is still the bulwark of all the evils that slavery has bequeathed. Perhaps the proper remedy for the Southern troubles is to appoint these superserviceable ecclesiastics as a Supreme Theocratic Commission, with absolute power to govern the country according to Bible precedents. But from this programme we respectfully dissent.

AT THE opening "religious exercises" in the Massachusetts Legislature, on January 6, "a majority of the legislators left the State House;" and "when the lieutenant-governor and staff and members of the Senate had entered the Representatives' Hall, it was not half filled." Rev. E. C. Bolles, of Salem, preached a sermon on the relation between Church and State; and he took the ground of the Christian Amendment party that "under Church and State alike should be the foundation of God's Word and law." The thoughtful will draw their own conclusions; but it seems sufficiently clear that these "exercises" ought to be abolished, unless in this manner the Church is to be recognized indirectly as the foundation of the State. "God's Word" means the Bible: are the people to accept this corner-stone of Protestantism as also the corner-stone of the republic?

THE Committee of Arrangements for the dedication of the Paine Memorial Building, consisting of Messrs. Horace Seaver, J. P. Mendum, and T. L. Savage, will please accept our thanks for their polite card of invitation to be present at the ceremonies, which will take place on Friday, January 29, day and evening. The doors will be open at 10 o'clock, A.M., for inspection of the building. Further particulars will probably be announced soon. The exterior of the building is very imposing, and the interior will undoubtedly correspond. The "Two T. P.'s," Theodore Parker and Thomas Paine, are thus to be commemorated by adjacent Memorial Buildings; and old Dr. Griffin's "Brimstone Corner" gives place to an American "Exchange of Opinion," where brimstone will be at a ruinous discount and where there will be a permanent "corner" on Orthodoxy.

PRESIDENT WHITE's lecture last Sunday, in the Horticultural Hall course, was on "The Warfare of Science." Under the kindred title, "The Battlefields of Science," it was substantially given to our readers in THE INDEX of Feb. 4, 1871; though the lecture has been enriched with additional and valuable matter, and would be gladly republished in THE INDEX. The Upper Hall was well filled, and the large audience listened with unabated interest for nearly two hours. With a graphic pen Mr. White sketched the long conflict between Science and Christianity, both Protestant and Catholic; but the premises, which were identical with those of the most pronounced anti-Christian, were made to minister to a disappointing Neo-Christian conclusion. The next century will smile at our difficulty in getting out of the fog. Mr. White's affluent resources, however, furnished information as useful as it was trustworthy; and his more radical passages were received with applause.

THE NATIONAL SUNDAY LEAGUE, of London, is engaged in a most useful and admirable work. Its three main objects are to secure the opening of public libraries, museums, and art-galleries on Sunday; to run cheap Sunday excursions in summer; and to provide "Sunday Evenings for the People" in winter, for the purpose of furnishing innocent entertainment and useful instruction for non-churchgoers. These plans have already achieved a good measure of success, especially the latter two. A Sunday Shakespeare Society has been formed in connection with the League, which also publishes an excellent monthly paper, the Free Sunday Advocate, under the editorial direction of Mrs. J. H. Simpson and Mr. Mark H. Judge. Opposed to this League is the Lord's Day Observance Society, which attempted last summer to break up the Sunday excursions by legal prohibition, but signally failed. Similar attempts to break up the "Sunday Evenings for the People" have also been defeated. The whole movement of the League is philanthropic in the truest sense of the word.

Human Nature.

FIRST LECTURE IN THE SEVENTH COURSE OF SUNDAY AFTER-NOON LECTURES, IN HORTICULTURAL HALL,
 BOSTON, JAN. 3, 1875.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The subject of this lecture is Human Nature. My purpose is to present in outline the scientific view of it as contrasted with the traditional and the sentimental view.

The subject is deeply and wholly practical, and only incidentally speculative. All our dealings with men—and which of our dealings are not, directly or indirectly, dealings with men?—suppose our estimate more or less consciously entertained, more or less intelligently assumed, of the nature of man; all religions accept a theory of human nature, and group their various doctrines and rites about it. So do all forms of government. The despot, the legislator, the statesman, economist, reformer, justify their policy by certain preëxisting conceptions of mankind, which are to them unquestionable and fundamental. Commerce has a certain undefined yet broadly positive conception of human nature; so has trade, in the smaller details it deals with. In fact, we cannot hold any relations with mankind, even the most incidental and occasional, without some notion of the kind of being we are dealing with. Institutions rest on human nature; laws address themselves to human nature; customs express human nature. If there be a creature it is of consequence to know about, not to surmise, conjecture, speculate, or romance about, that creature is man; for failing to know him we are in the dark about everything; we travel in an unknown country; we build our habitations on sand. Thus far, we have had doctrines of human nature, instead of facts of human nature. If this were all, the mischief would be transient; for the doctrines might be modified and changed, and better ones substituted for worse. But the misfortune is that the doctrines have, in the regards of men, taken the place of facts. They claimed to be facts, proclamations of inner facts, of the very soul of fact. They claimed to be the articulate words of a Being whose words were things. The theologians have thus far enjoyed a monopoly of the doctrine respecting human nature, and the theologian's clearest notion of a fact is a printed text of the Old or New Testament. A few black lines on a piece of paper are more to him than all the records on living tissues, or the data of laboriously acquired science. A declaration in an old psalm, written by a morbid singer in a fit of unusual depression, to the effect that man is conceived in iniquity and born in sin, decides the case against all argument. Even yet, it is difficult to think of human nature as we think of other nature, animate or inanimate. We scarcely succeed in doing more than dream about it in the uneasy drowse that precedes the waking from our intellectual coma.

There are three views to be taken of human nature: the view of its essential depravity; the view of its essential nobility; and the view of its creaturely imperfection. A glance at the three is all my space allows.

Let us consider first the theory of DEPRAVITY, the Christian theory. Without seeking its remote origin, it is enough for our present purpose to trace it to the New Testament, whence the Christian Church professes to derive it. The interpretation of the myth of Eden is there given, to the chronic discouragement of man. The Epistle to the Romans, the Protestants' vade mecum, affirms the doctrine of depravity in language as strong as the vocabulary will furnish. From chapter to chapter the apostle rings the dismal changes on sin and death. He cannot speak emphatically enough of the fallen, abject, helpless condition of human nature. Sin has taken possession of him, and become the tenant of his frame. He speaks of himself as if his personal consciousness revealed a universal secret—as "carnal, sold under sin." "What I do is not of myself; what I would I do not; what I would not I do." I know that in me, that is, in my nature (for by flesh Paul means natural constitution), dwelleth no good thing. He goes so far as to speak of a "law" of sin, as if sin was an organic force, an accumulated and consolidated power, weighty enough at the beginning to overbear all human motive and resolution, but in process of time of a crushing energy that acts like fate.

The Roman Catholic Church followed in this as in other respects the milder tradition of Peter, who spoke of men as "strangers and pilgrims" on the earth, bewildered by error and frailty, though still endowed with sufficient moral ability to walk in a divinely indicated path. The doctrine of the Roman Church as stated by Adam Moehler, one of its most liberal teachers, is this: that the first man was made upright, but dependent on supernatural grace for his moral elevation and support. His act of disobedience deprived him of this supernatural aid, and left him, a mere natural man, with all his possibilities, but no eternal sunshine or celestial air to quicken them into life. The seeds of Paradise slumbered in the heavy sod. No vision of divine things could he have; his spiritual eye was closed; his heart clung fondly to objects about him—kindred, friends, neighbors,—but had lost its hold on heavenly companions; his conscience trembled and reeled, clutching spasmodically at the straws that floated by, and the reeds that grew by the bank of life's troubled river; his reason, perfectly adequate to the conduct of terrestrial affairs, was wholly incompetent to deal with the principles of right and wrong. The Catholic held the doctrine of human imbecility, rather than the doctrine of human depravity, and so opened the way to a recognition of a nobleness that was native to mankind. He was never a wholesale calumniator of his species; and while his method was unscientific as could be, the result of it was something less than abominable; it had even an air of common sense and moderation, as compared with the frightful doctrines of his opponents.

Protestantism accepted Paul as its prophet, and was more than faithful to his teaching. The burning rhetoric of the apostle hardened as it cooled into jagged rocks of dogma on which the tender hopes of mankind staggered with bleeding feet, and fell. I need not quote the brutal language of the German Luther, nor the deadly phrases of the French Calvin. The thought of to-day alone concerns us. Mr. Beecher, of Brooklyn, who represents better than anybody the chameleon type of Protestantism—true, it was six months ago, and he might disown it now,—said: "Of one thing there can be no doubt—that the whole world lies in wickedness." The creed of Plymouth Church, which on ceremonial occasions is periodically repeated by the Protean pastor, holds that the first man was created upright, that he fell by an act of disobedience, and that all his posterity are, not prone to sin merely, but actually sinful and guilty in the sight of God. John Hall, the foremost Presbyterian minister in New York, preaches that although the depravity of human nature does not always break forth in outrageous excess, and is often wholly concealed beneath the amenities of life, still it is not inactive. The Spirit of the World and of the Prince of the World—we know who is meant by that—is in every unregenerate person.

The doctrine of human depravity is, therefore, not dead. It is preached without compromise from metropolitan pulpits; as it proceeds from provincial pulpits, it has the acrid taste of three hundred years ago. It takes other forms than those of doctrine. It appears in the disposition—all but universal—to judge men by low standards, to put the worst interpretation on language, the harshest construction on conduct. A knowledge of the world is supposed to be a knowledge that every man is a knave, and every woman a coquette. The flippant criticism that is passed on the politician, the statesman, the financier, lawyer, reformer, philanthropist—the shrug of the shoulders, the shake of the head, the wink of the eye,—show the taint which this old doctrine has communicated to the blood. The believer in natural virtue is regarded as little better than a fool.

See it break out again in the still extant ideas respecting domestic discipline, based on the assumption that children are imps of Satan, embryos of the evil one, who come wailing into a wicked world, and who at the expense of more wailings, due to prohibition and scourging, must be rescued from the pitfalls which the evil ones dig in their pathway, and carefully covers up with twigs and roses. See evidence of it again in the Christian theories of education,—Catholic and Protestant wrangling furiously over the public schools, to determine which shall have the privilege of administering the patented nostrum to the boys and girls; whether a Bible text or a statue of the Virgin Mary shall perform the office of counteracting the deadly poison that secular knowledge introduces into the natural mind, knowledge pure and simple being regarded as bane. The theory of depravity comes out in the popular notion of law as a supernatural power, which men must obey, not question; in the popular notion of government as a superhuman institution, planted in the world by divine decree, supported by divine grace, and administered by divine wisdom; in the proposition to save the people of the United States by inserting a confession of God and Christ in the National Constitution. The early founders of Massachusetts had a thought—perfectly consistent with their theological belief—of entrusting the offices of civil administration to none but church-members, who, as elect and regenerate, represented the Christ on earth. Their plan had the virtue of a manly integrity, which is more than can be said of the plan of their descendants. The modern Puritans are either more wily or more superstitious than their fathers. If, by inserting the name of God into the text of the Constitution, they meditate a gradual introduction of church-members into office, their diplomacy is worthy of a society which is not spoken respectfully of in the Protestant world. If they honestly believe that by printing that august word on thick, official paper they shall secure the permanent action of the Christ in caucus meetings, or the constant energy of the Holy Ghost in disinfecting the city of Washington and the chambers of Congress, their superstition would make the shade of Cotton Mather blush.

The doctrine of the essential depravity of human nature is a pure speculation, born of an era when men, having no knowledge of the world they lived in, and no means of acquiring knowledge of it, no breadth of experience, no wide commerce with their kind, no skill or habit of observation, drew on their fancy for their facts, and constructed the being they could not study. So stubborn did the habit of dreaming become in the thousands of years of this kind of brooding contemplation, that even now men, as by an implanted instinct, instead of studying Nature, study texts. They put aside Darwin, and read the second chapter of Genesis. Any ancient legend is better authority than any modern fact.

When the era of observation began, the shapes of man that met the opening eyes were not such as might encourage enthusiasm or faith. The prominent persons were emperors, princes, kings, strong and rich nobles, who practised cruelties worthy of fiends, and indulged appetites after the manner of beasts. And when they looked beyond these monsters of lust and iniquity they discerned slavish submission, deceit, and nameless abominations of filth. To have discovered any theory but that of human depravity in the specimens that those wild ages offered would have reflected no credit on the discernment of conscience. The doctrine lives now on its memory, and justifies itself by the morbid casuistry that turns and twists, inverts and perverts, assumes the heart to be a sepulchre, and therefore finds it full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness.

It is needless to say now that the doctrine of human depravity is worthless as a key to human nature. It unlocks no secret chamber. It brings to light nothing. To say that it leaves the natural goodness of mankind unaccounted for is as if one should say that black paint will not account for the presence on a canvas of white lines, that ink spots will not throw light on the purity of paper, or that the nigritudinosity of mud is no explanation of a lily's whiteness. The believers in human depravity simply deny the existence of natural goodness, or, failing in ability to do that, ascribe it to the silent trickling of the divine grace through some exposed crack in their mental integument. Theologians are adepts in this transcendental chemistry—which deals with gases less ponderous than oxygen, and produces with the Holy Spirit effects more surprising than Tyndall produces with light. He does not merit the name of theologian who cannot at call bring the Holy Spirit to his aid when logic proves too much for his case. The Holy Ghost has the run of the universe, with liberty to create goodness at will, and the theologian is bound to admit its presence wherever virtue shows its flower above the black ground.

The real task laid on the doctrine of human depravity is to account for the natural badness of man. The turpitude of mankind seldom exhibits the quality that this doctrine demands. It is not sufficiently ingrained in the texture of the creature. How comes it that the vilest of the vile—their circumstances being changed, their environment altered, their relations readjusted, their temptations diminished, other sets of motives appealed to, other hopes awakened—emerge from their bestiality, and show themselves men and women? How comes it that a little tillage of the native soil with such implements of husbandry as lie at hand is followed by such admirable fruits? How comes it that on the removal of a few rubbish-heaps,—ignorance, limitation, custom, evil association,—the crushed and measly ground clears itself of centipedes, and pushes up the clover-blossom in response to sun and air? How comes it that bad qualities have an aspect of goodness to them, as if their cursedness were incidental and relative, not substantial—base things looking often like fine things in disguise, and abominable things looking like beauties out of place? Where, on the diabolic theory, the strange similarity between wheat and tares, which not only suggests the expediency of letting both grow together till the harvest, but also suggests that the Lord of the harvest may wisely decide to gather the tares into the barn, and cast the wheat into the furnace? If we could find a vein of pure, unadulterated, infusible devilry running beneath any considerable tract of humanity, the doctrine of depravity might be called in to explain it; but as it is, the doctrine raises more difficulties than it puts away—is itself, in fact, a supreme difficulty which psychology must account for. Probably the Darwinian hypothesis will show, as a final triumph, how men transferred to themselves the monstrosity of the creatures they succeeded.

We must do human nature the justice to say that the doctrine of human depravity never held undisputed sway in Christendom. In the nature of things it could not. It was, even in the worst times, impossible that so insolent a doctrine should be preached generation after generation to men of all conditions and degrees without vehement reaction and earnest challenge. Men are not in the habit of listening to billingsgate without resentment. Perhaps this is a sign of their depravity. Had they not been unregenerate they would, when called raca, have made no references to hell-fire. They did not bless their slanderers. In the fourth century, already the voice of protest was raised loud enough to be heard all over Christendom. It was the voice of a British monk that startled Augustine in his African diocese. With genuine British common sense and pluck, Pelagius raised an outcry, in the name of character, against a doctrine that made character impossible. If, he said, human nature is essentially depraved there is no moral freedom; if there is no moral freedom there is no responsibility; if there is no responsibility there is no room for praise or blame; if there is no room for praise or blame there is no such thing as worth, and character is but a name. Character supposes power to be virtuous; if a man's nature is prescribed for him by the devil, it is the devil's and not his own; if a man's character is vouchsafed to him by the Christ, it is the Christ's and not his own. Adam cannot be good or bad for me. I stand for myself. Every individual counts one; his qualities are his own, and for them he is answerable. If we all fell in Adam, then individuality is a fiction. Instead of being many we are one—and that one is the first one. Pelagius, plain, solid, common-sense, practical Englishman, was no match for the subtle Augustine, who soon vanquished him, and branded him as a heretic. But the voice of conscience would not hush at the bidding of dialectics. Pelagius was pronounced by the Church a misbeliever; but the human consciousness attested his Orthodoxy. Yet so a thousand years passed before another great protest rang through Europe. This time it was the voice of an Italian that spoke, out of the land of institutions, where the power of conscience was venerated in law. He was well born, a scholar, a student of history, a man of uncommon reflection. But the voice from Italy only echoed the voice from Britain. The appeal was still to reason, judgment, the intuitive moral sense, the practical convictions of mankind. "I know when I do wrong; I know when I do right. That I have power to refrain from doing wrong, that I have power to do what I feel to be right,—this too I know. I stand by myself, free, a subject for praise and blame, for punishment or reward. With Adam I have nothing to do. If he sinned, he sinned for himself; if he fell, he fell for himself. No doubt, long practice of evil has created a stubborn habit of practising evil, and rendered it much easier to do wrong than right. The man who set the first example of wrong-doing, and so begun the bad custom, has much to answer for. But the fact remains the same that whoever sins sins for himself. He cannot lay off his trespass on a depraved nature." Socinus, who will be recognized as the father of modern Unitarianism, which at first bore the name of Socinianism, admitted frankly that, to balance the weight of disadvantage imposed by the deadly law of habit, a Savior was necessary, an inspired book, a perpetual priesthood, a supernatural accession of power. Nevertheless, every man was declared free to avail himself of these supports. The supernatural world was not separated from him by an impassable gulf; his reason could apprehend its truth, his heart could respond to its solicitations, his will could grasp its motives. There was affinity yet between the human and the divine. Nature recognized the presence and answered the call of Spirit.

Again the voice was silenced. Socinus went from town to town, from city to city, from country to country, a persecuted man. He died, and the black billows of Orthodoxy rolled over him.

For as yet there was no consistent theory of human nature to oppose to that of depravity. The protest was earnest, but incoherent. It was not an argument, but a cry. There was no rational psychology, no scientific method, no fundamental position, even; and before the disciplined phalanx which the dogma of depravity wielded, the scattering suggestions of disbelief could make no stand. Within Christianity no efficient resistance has yet been offered.

At last a new doctrine shaped itself, in form the precise opposite of the Christian. It came originally from the land of Luther. According to this doctrine man was a spiritual being, of nature essentially divine, rather a descendant from an upper sphere than an ascendant from a lower. To those who held this great conception, the notion of human depravity was abhorrent. They thought of man as a being who had a religious nature, out of whose heart religion came, to whose soul religion was native air. They could not find speech strong enough to voice their detestation of a doctrine that deprived the soul of its weight, the conscience of its responsibility, the heart of its affections, and the will of its power. For man, the essential creature, too much could not be said. He might be ignorant, limited, crippled in his lot, stunted in his faculties, bewildered by false teaching; but beneath darkness, lumpishness, vice, crime, sin, the seeds of virtue slept never to die, and at the touch of truth beat impatiently under the sod. Man was an angel, not a fiend incarnate; he brought with him airs from heaven, not blasts from hell; his humanity sweetened instead of poisoning the world.

The apostle of this great faith, in America, was Channing, a man whose thought made an epoch. He was not a great theologian; not a deep philosopher; not a keen psychologist; not a scientific observer. But in singleness of mind, sincerity, earnestness, devoutness, and reach of moral insight, he stood so high as to stand almost alone. Deep-hearted himself, and meeting heart to heart his kind, he felt the dignity he could not explain. Human nature was to him the complete expression of the divine mind. It was the conscience that gave revelation of law, the heart that gave revelation of love, the reason that gave revelation of truth. Church, Bible, and creed must render account of themselves to the soul. The Father's child, the Christ's brother, is authorized to sit in judgment on evangelists and apostles, on teachers and priests. The cardinal belief of religion according to Channing is THE DIGNITY OF HUMAN NATURE.

That phrase became the watchword of a new reformation. The idea it contained took Channing out of the limits of his dry and technical sect, and clothed him in the garb of a prophet. Though not perfectly formulated, though never very profoundly or clearly conceived,—for Channing, who had in him just a touch of asceticism, sometimes spoke as if man was after all a fallen creature, found in the stiff integument of the body, the passions still strong with a smell of sulphur about them, temptation being of the evil one, and the world a place of danger,—still, for all this, the doctrine flew fast, and carried regeneration on its wings. It was felt in the home, awakening a new spirit of tenderness, suggesting new methods of influence, prompting new rules of discipline, creating a new atmosphere in the nursery and the primary school. It was felt in high schools, seminaries, and colleges, giving fresh and luminous meaning to the great word "education,"—the leading forth of the rational being into the world of intelligence, and remanding to its original sense the word "instruction"—which implied that the mind must be built in by walls of dogma. It was felt in politics, the conception of law laying by its severity, and serving now to emphasize, instead of repressing, the moral sense; the conception of government emptying itself of its despotic significance, and reinforcing the reason's consciousness of its right to rule. Reason soared above all legislative enactments, and proclaimed the existence of an unwritten law, to which all authorities must bow. A breath of human sympathy crept into the stony heart of legislation. The criminal code was forced to plead at the tribunal of the heart. Hopeful words were spoken in prison-cells. The thief and the murderer were added to the catalogue of human beings. The instruments of torture were thrown aside. A firm hand was laid on the vindictive gallows,—instrument of retaliation in the eyes of most, symbol of expiation in the regards of a few.

The new doctrine raised up a host of reformers and philanthropists; an enthusiasm of humanity took possession of the community; another crusade was preached for the recovery from the infidel of the holy places. The poor must be emancipated from the thralldom of necessity; the vicious must be reclaimed; the criminal must be reformed; the abandoned must be brought to themselves; the defaced image of God must be dug out of the slime, and cleaned, and set up in its place.

Against the two most stubborn representatives of the Christian doctrine—war and slavery—the gentle apostle threw himself like a champion of the holy grail. In the name of the dignity of human nature, Napoleon, the greatest soldier of many centuries, was arraigned at the bar of justice. In the same august name the challenge was flung at America's pet institution, as it sat high among its worshippers, defended by custom, honored by wealth, fawned on by fashion, and blessed by religion. The silence of adulation was broken by the still, small voice. The puny frame, trembling with the burden of its regenerating message, stepped into the crowd of politicians and divines, took the black man by the hand and raised him up. It was one of the bravest things that was ever done; all the braver because the man who did it was delicate and sensitive, the centre himself of an adoring crowd whose incense was ceaselessly rising to his nostrils; all the braver because while he called the negro "brother" he refused to call his master "thief," but respected the humanity in both; all the braver because the act brought upon him misunderstanding from those who should have been his supporters, and exposed him to assault from those who should have fought by his side.

In presence of such a prophet and priest as Channing, it is easy to do full justice to the doctrine of the dignity of human nature. Indeed, the only difficult thing is to criticise it. So full of inspiration it has been, so rich in suggestion, so pregnant with fine hints towards a better society, so noble and tender in all its aspects, that it seems ungracious not to rest finally in it as the ultimate truth. But the doctrine has its weak side. Like the opposing belief, it was a theory, pure speculation resting on no observation of facts, but borrowed from the philosophy of the last century. Its disciples read it into the New Testament, and claimed for it the authority of Jesus. The sentimentalism of France and the transcendentalism of Germany lent their sanction to it; it was fortified by the ardent hopefulness that characterized a young people, with unlimited opportunity in the present, and a boundless prospect in the future. But it never sunk deep into the popular heart, never became a general conviction as the old faith did. It remained to the last the belief of a limited number of enthusiastic spirits, and, its hours of transport and triumph ended, gave way to another view.

The weak points in Channing's doctrine are too obvious to need indication. In distinction from the old theory which exhausted casuistry to prove that every man was a demon, this exhausted persuasion to prove that every man was an angel. Orthodoxy threw the diamond into the crucible, and taking out the carbon equivalent tauntingly said, "There is your jewel, man; make the best of him!" Channing, seeing the diamond latent in the lump of carbon, undertook the opposite task of transmutation, and failing to produce the diamond said: "Nevertheless, it is there; you may see it flash in the dark." The doctrine of the dignity of human nature is pledged to glorify it under all conditions. It must excuse faults, palliate enormities, cover up iniquities, whitewash turpitudes, insist that people are at heart, not only better than they seem, but substantially good, and declare that the eye of love can alone read character. Always to love and always to pardon was its motto. Its mantle of charity was so large that it lapped over the area of this life, and spread its warm covering over the endless æons of the hereafter. Faith in the possibilities of human nature distanced all facts.

The doctrine gives no adequate account of the bad side of men. If men are angels imprisoned or enshrouded, why is the angelhood so backward in appearing? Why so many gratuitous liars, thieves, backbiters, betrayers, killers, ravagers of happiness, and destroyers of bliss? Why such supererogation in works of darkness,—such superfluity of devilry? Circumstance will explain all that, you say. Poverty, ignorance, unfortunate birth, early perversion, and neglect. But are all liars poor, all thieves ignorant, all killers badly born, all soul-destroyers unfortunately placed? If comfortable circumstances, intelligence, open opportunity, flattering inducements, pleasant social position, are advantages, why does the angel forbear to use them? But they are not always advantages, you reply. They may be obstacles, burdens, temptations of another kind; illusions and seductions, these. Must we not then doubt the angelhood? Either it is not there, or, being there, its presence can be only surmised. Can dignity be ascribed to an angel so hopelessly weak?

Of the doctrine of Depravity I said that, while it failed to explain natural goodness, it more signally failed to explain natural badness. Of the doctrine of Dignity it may be said that, while it fails to explain natural badness, it more signally fails to explain natural goodness. For goodness does not break upon us like the sun from a cloud which has hidden it for a moment; it comes like the pond-lily, the night-blooming cereus, or the ripe apple, which shows the quality and crowns the effort of stem or trunk. Of natural goodness, in the sense of goodness latent and obstructed, a ready-made quality of heart or conscience, there is little if any. There is possibility of goodness, and there is possibility of fruit in the pear tree; but there is no pear till every process of growth has been passed through. In a word, goodness is a result, not an entity; a product, not a principle. Children are good only as slips are trees. The good man is the natural man, the bad man is the unnatural. But the goodness is at the end, not at the beginning. It is a crown, not a star. The doctrine of Dignity, assuming that every man and woman is an angel in disguise, and accepting the task of finding the angel in the person, overlooks the fact that angels are got out of men by another process: not extracted like the kernel from a nut, but expressed like juice from the vine. They are oftener found sitting by the grave than sleeping in the cradle.

Thus neither of the two doctrines accounts for the facts. Neither interprets satisfactorily the signs of good and evil; neither explains the mixture of elements in character; neither gives a reason for the relative worth of moral qualities; neither solves the riddle of their apparent identity of substance; neither answers the question touching the relation between quality and condition. The one simply denies that Nature makes any saints; the other denies that Nature makes any sinners. But the method by which either saints or sinners are produced, is left unrevealed. The one tasks faculty to show the worthlessness of natural goodness, and gloats over the discovery of rot at the heart's core; the other equally tasks faculty to show the preciousness of natural goodness, and exults on finding a sound seed in the middle of the decayed pulp; but neither studies the law of growth and decay.

Another philosophy must be invited to furnish the key of the riddle,—the PHILOSOPHY OF EVOLUTION. Science favors no prepossessions either against man or in his favor. It asks to know what man is. Its studies are not in anthropology, but in natural history. The NATURAL HISTORY OF MAN; that phrase tells the whole story. It implies that human nature is not a thing, a gift, a quality, an essence, a quiddity, planted in every creature of the race; not a transmitted principle which holds its own, preserving its identity through all changes; but is in bulk a product, the result of innumerable ages of thinking, feeling, groping, reaching, endeavoring, experimenting, struggling, battling, winning, losing, acquiring, consolidating, transmitting, creating, and preserving.

It is a current phrase that human nature is the same all over the world; that from generation to generation its general attributes do not vary. Is it so? The differing customs, laws, institutions, governments do not so report. The savage man and the civilized confess no identity of nature. The races do not assume it, but face each other with blank countenance and lack-lustre eyes. Human nature in the West is stranger to human nature in the East. Human nature in the South fails to comprehend human nature in the North. There is small affinity between human nature in priest-ridden Spain and human nature in free England; between human nature in Turkey and human nature in the United States; between human nature in Cork or Dublin and human nature in Boston or Chicago.

The Italian of mature age does not find himself at home in the New World; the German, the Celt, the Chinaman instinctively herd with their own kind, as if afraid to trust themselves with people they do not understand. The New Englander and the Hollander have as much ado in fraternizing, except on the principle of mutual toleration, as if they belonged to different species.

There are, no doubt, certain established identities; for experiences are identical, and result in the same cardinal qualities which come at last to be characteristic of humanity.

In the course of their development, all human creatures meet three stages of experience, and achieve three things. Existence is impossible anywhere unless three things are secured,—safety of the person, safety of property, safety of the home. But what infinite variety men exhibit in the means of achieving these three ends, the means of preserving them, and the estimate of their value when attained! Here men go armed, and have all the instincts, beliefs, convictions of the soldier; there weapons are laid by, their use is forgotten, and men have the instincts, beliefs, convictions of the civilian. In this place property is defended by force, in that it is protected by written or unwritten law; and the whole man is invested in each method. Compare the domestic arrangements of a wealthy Turk, Egyptian, or Arab with those of a wealthy Englishman, Scotchman, or American. Compare the sentiments in regard to woman in India and in Germany! Consider the different place assigned to the same qualities in different states of society! Think how the lowest attributes in one race are ranked highest with another, so that virtues and vices change positions!

"If," says Pascal, "man had known the economy of the world he wishes to govern, he would not have established as a maxim that each should follow the customs of this country. The splendor of true justice would have subjected all peoples, and legislators would not have preferred to this constant equity the fancies and caprices of Persians or Gauls. We should see it planted in all States of the world and in all times, instead of seeing as we do now scarcely anything just or unjust that does not change quality with climate. Three degrees of higher latitude overturn all jurisprudence. A meridian decides the truth; fundamental laws change every few years. Right has its epochs: the entrance of Saturn into the constellation Leo marks the origin of a special crime. A pitiful justice that, bounded by a river! Truth one side of the Pyrenees, error the other!" What Pascal records in bitter scorn, holding human nature in derision, the man of science quietly makes note of, as indicating that human nature is a product, dependent on conditions, varying with soil and climate, shaped by contingent experiences, and taking hue and flavor from the elements that pass into it.

This doctrine answers a multitude of questions. It tells us why men are as good as they are, and no better; why customs are as favorable to virtue as they are, and why they are no more so; why the average goodness is what it is, and how it happens that there is any goodness at all. It enables us to trace qualities from their genesis up; to see them cross, mingle, blend, appear, disappear, undergo modifications of exaltation or depression. It will undertake to explain peculiarities of goodness, remarkable phases of virtue, even eccentricities of excellence or baseness. What the theory of Depravity accounts for by special inspiration, what the theory of Dignity only wonders at as being so rare, the theory of Evolution disposes of without effort.

Arnold von Winkelreid, at the battle of Sempach, seeing the desperate situation of affairs, dashed forward shouting, "Countrymen, take care of my wife and children," gathered into his bosom and so rendered harmless a sheaf of Austrian spears, and over his dead body launched the Swiss into the heart of the foe's lines. For four centuries the deed has been celebrated in the annals of heroism. Glorify it, for it is worthy of glory; but remember that Winkelreid was a Swiss; that patriotism was the Switzer's religion; that to die for country was as easy as to live, and more famous; that among his comrades there was more than one capable of the same consecration; that sacrifice of that kind was the ordinary virtue of a military age; and that the knight was no more conscious of doing a great deed than a good merchant is when he pays his debts in hard times. Had he done otherwise, he would have falsified the traditions of his life. That Winkelreid was a hero all over there is no reason to believe. We only know what he was on one occasion as a Swiss knight.

An engineer, driving his train, sees on the track before him a child playing with pebbles, alone, without a protector. He "slows" the train, springs off, dashes forward, snatches the child away at the risk of his own life, leaps back upon the engine, and looking back sees the frantic mother flying to the rescue of her delivered darling. All the neighborhood rung with the deed. The man was lauded for his humanity even more than for his daring; though had his foot slipped, and the train met with mishap in consequence of his desertion of it, there would have been an outcry against the recklessness that, in the vain hope to save a child, imperilled the lives of a hundred men and women. The deed of the brave engineer is not to be universally commended. But passing such considerations by, and regarding simply the personal valor of the act, may we not credit it to the peculiar discipline of the engineer's life; to the special training of his profession? His duty was to run his train with safety to everybody on the road. In this duty his conscience culminated. To this every thought converged. On this his whole heart was set. Fidelity to his calling demanded that, as fidelity to his knightly calling demanded Winkelreid's sacrifice. Off his engine and his road his humanity was probably not eminent. But there the flower of discipline bloomed with a splendor that amazed the eye.

The city missionary who stays all summer in the infected town when all who can flee away, simply acts out the special bent of character to which he has been determined. By organization, taste, sensibilities, and insensibilities, by practice and routine he is predestined to that kind of faithfulness. The heroism of philanthropy is often a streak of moral energy as distinct from the rest of character, as the vein of gold is from the black quartz it traverses. I have seen it gleaming in a mass of hypocrisy and lies, of private vanities, tyrannies, cruelties even, that would have made the person execrable, if unrelieved by this attractive gift.

Mr. Martineau contends that in the case of three moral virtues which he enumerates—compassion, self-forgetfulness, and the sense of duty—humanity is left unsupported by the constitution of the world. And so they are, if by the constitution of the world we mean the material order; for Nature, as interpreted by the law of evolution, is pitiless, self-asserting, and reckless. But the constitution of the social world educates us in virtues that the brute world never suggests. Human feeling inculcates what animal instinct would disapprove. As, without compassion, self-forgetfulness, and a sense of duty, families could not be reared, or commonwealths exist, or laws be enforced; as, in a word, the mutual needs of mankind demand them,—it is fair to number them among the genuine products of experience; and the circumstance that they are so very far from uniform in their manifestation goes to confirm this belief.

Virtue answers to development. The world has got so far on its way; so far in Europe, so far in Africa, so far in America, so far in Louisiana, so far in Massachusetts; so far and no further; and the progress measures the character. A negro girl, being slightly reprimanded by her mistress for a fault, attempted to poison the whole family. When confronted with her crime, she manifested no emotion, but hung her head in dogged silence. The papers paraded this as an instance of total depravity. Say total ignorance, total obtuseness, total neglect. She belonged to a race which, time out of mind, had been brutalized, bestialized, crushed; a race that had been forbidden learning, aspiration, growth. Of responsibility she had no sense, of law no knowledge, of social fraternity no suspicion. The lack of humanity in her exhibits its nature, and she is taxed with having lost by sin what she never had.

The doctrine of Depravity divided society into regenerate and unregenerate, saints and sinners. The doctrine of Dignity classifies all people as possible saints. The doctrine of Development abolishes both saint and sinner, and substitutes human creatures in the infinite stages of their immaturity. It declares every sinner to be a partial saint, every saint to be a partial sinner. It substitutes qualities for attributes, gains for gifts, acquisitions for endowments, and distributes them impartially among mankind. It concedes no absolute moral perfection to Jesus, no absolute baseness to Judas; but, studying both by the light of their epoch, assigns to each the qualities which the national and private exigency called forth, and tries to render simple justice to both. It takes a portion of the iniquity from Henry VIII., and bestows it on the lords and ladies of his not too virtuous court. Imperfection in all creatures is its motto. All who come up out of the same dust, live under the same general influences, share the same general experiences, meet life on the same plane, reap the same field of experience, have with multitudinous special variations the same essential characteristics. Each age has its virtues and vices, from both of which none of its children are wholly exempt.

This doctrine explains, too, the backwardness of mankind, the slowness of movement, the dead weight that hangs round the neck of advance. The generation goes so far and stops. Sir Thomas More with all his intellect could not overpass the dogma of transubstantiation. The intellect of Isaac Newton plashed about in the fen of apocalyptic calculations, the mathematician of the skies puzzling like a school-boy over the number of the Beast. The soul of Jesus was entangled in the meshes of the Messianic doctrine. We speak rather disparagingly of people who are "wise in their generation." It were not easy to find one who is wiser than his generation. The tide-wave touches a certain line, and recedes that succeeding waves may have their chance. What goes beyond the determined line is spray, not ocean. Aspiration, hope, dream, purpose fly beyond the boundary, but character remains within it. At moments the Millennium seems at hand. The young men see visions, and the old men dream dreams; souls are alight with prophecy; but it is never fulfilled. The fire burns out, and a pile of cold ashes bears witness that it was of mortal origin, and consumed mortal materials.

The doctrine of Depravity leaves the steady progress of the world unaccounted for. The doctrine of Dignity leaves the slowness of the world's progress unaccounted for. How can a lump of clay move? How can an angel loiter? The doctrine of Development explains and justifies both facts. The power that works for righteousness, the conditions of its working, and the result of the working within the conditions, are all allowed for; and while the wings of hope are unclipped, expectation is sobered, emotion is chastened, and endeavor defined.

Here at last we have a doctrine of human nature that offers a basis for science. The believer in human depravity resorts to the Church, and to sacramental grace. The believer in human dignity resorts to sentiment, and consults the oracles of hope. The believer in development studies facts, and lays the groundwork of social science. For him there are no raptures, no despairs. Serious, devoted, humble, certain that the world moves on, certain that it moves by law, certain that it must move slowly, certain that every straw must be cleared up, for the economical providence is not indulgent towards litter, certain that the ground to be traversed cannot be skimmed over by wings, or skipped over by jumps, but must be measured inch by inch with careful steps, he is earnest and patient. He looks for no immediate heaven, he fears no prospective hell. The shout of the enthusiast and the warning of the sceptic address him equally in vain. He is no doctrinaire or sentimentalist. He is neither optimist nor pessimist. A fact to him is worth more than all fancies, glad or gloomy. For a fact is a steppingstone on which he can place his steady foot. Praying for no revivals by supernatural grace, hoping for no spasms of philanthropy or sudden outbreaks of reform, but rather dreading both, he labors to ascertain the conditions of happy living and to touch the springs of virtuous character; and seeing the effect of his method on mankind he is encouraged to believe that in the future man may be man indeed. This will be

Might—never put forth blindly, nor controlled
Calmly by perfect knowledge;
Knowledge—not intuition, but the slow
Uncertain fruit of our enhancing toil
Strengthened by love; Love—not serenely pure,
But power from weakness, like a chance-sown plant
Which, cast on stubborn soil, puts forth changed buds
And softer stains, unknown in happier climes.
Anticipations, hints of these and more
Are strewn confusedly everywhere—all seek
An object to possess and stamp their own.
All shape out dimly the forthcoming race,
The heir of hopes too fair to turn out false.

MIRACLES A LA MODE.

Once upon a time there stood on the crest of a Provençal hill a declining town, which had formerly seen better days. It had a history of its own, a dilapidated fortress, a congregation of dark, crooked streets that seemed to be running hither and thither in search of daylight, and a sprinkling of inhabitants who partook of the general rustiness of the place, and croaked that things were no longer as they once had been. The reason of this was that the town had none of the elements which constitute urban vitality now-a-days. It was not on the trunk line of any railroad, nor on a broad river, nor had it even a canal near it; it was not healthy either, for there were swamps in the neighborhood, and in fact it had only sprung into being because of that old castle, around which in feudal times vassals of different degrees had built their houses for protection. Feudal times being gone, there was no cause why the town should flourish any longer, and there came a day when it looked as though the place was fast dwindling into a village; but towns, like men, can never guess what is in store for them. One morning it was learned that an old lady, who owned a fine tract of the swamps above-said, with an acre or two of vineyard, and a rickety farm-house, had died, leaving her property to a nephew in Paris, whom we may call M. Gaillard. This gentleman came in decent mourning to attend his aunt's funeral, and for the next few days might have been seen reconnoitering his inheritance with an eye devoid of enthusiasm. But towards the end of a week a strange thing occurred; for, instead of volunteering to sell his whole lot for a song, M. Gaillard, who was a bulky, astute-looking man, entered into negotiations with the owners of the remaining swamps, and offered to purchase at a low price.

Now, on the day before he broached this offer, bulky M. Gaillard had returned to his hotel, muddy up to the waist, and with a bottle of water peeping out of his coat pocket. No one took notice of the bottle, but some attention was paid to M. Gaillard; and, by dint of gossip and inquiries, it was soon ascertained that he dealt on the Bourse and had amassed a fortune as to the extent of which people differed—though, judged by appearances, he was not a very rich man. Peasant proprietors being cautious folk and shrewdly mistrustful of Parisians, the owners of the swamps hesitated to sell, wondering what could be M. Gaillard's motives for buying; but his account was very plausible. He saw his way to reclaiming the swamps; only, as he must needs embark considerable capital, he wished to have a sufficient tract to work on. After all, added he, there was no eagerness on his part, for it was a hazardous affair at the best, and he could only give the swamp owners three days to think over the affair. The owners took the three days, and then, after a desperate wrangle in which they succeeded in screwing out of the Parisian one-tenth more than he had originally offered, they sold him not only the swamps but about two hundred acres of other land—poor land,—and then went away laughing in their sleeve at having got to the weather side of this acute Bourse man. The fact is they well knew that the swamps could only be reclaimed at a cost which could never be recouped out of the yield of the land, and they were well content to part with their share of them as well as with the fields adjoining, which, owing to the marsh-vapors, lay almost sterile. As for M. Gaillard, looking not over pleased with his bargain, he returned to Paris, and the porter who carried his carpet-bag to the diligence yard observed that he held under his arm a bottle wrapped in newspaper, which gave rise to the rumor that the Parisian was taking away a sample of the local vintage with the idea of by-and-by planting vines on his swamps, and increased the hilarity of the peasants tenfold.

M. Gaillard remained absent about a month, and when he came back took up his abode in his farmhouse, and was frequently seen prodding the borders of his swamps with a stick. But after a little while he gave out ruefully that he had made a bad investment, for that the swamps would swallow up twenty times more than he could afford; and he submitted very good-naturedly to the banter of his neighbors, and especially of Farmer Nigot, who lived about a kilometre's distance from him, and passed for a religious and prudent man in the whole district. It so happened that Farmer Nigot had two little girls, Rose and Marie, aged twelve and ten respectively, who attended the nuns' school in the town, and returned home every evening. As their way lay past M. Gaillard's farm, that unlucky investor often met them, and, struck by their gay, innocent looks, he one day inquired of their father whether it were wise to let two such young children wander alone in the dark through deserted lanes. "Oh, my children are not timid," answered the farmer complacently; "the nuns have taught them to be afraid of nought but evil-doing." This was a highly sensible speech; it was made toward the beginning of November, when the days are short, and some evenings later Rose and Marie set out homeward as usual at about five o'clock, with their satchels and empty luncheon-baskets on their arms. Well, they had reached a spot where the swamps begun, some five hundred metres from M. Gaillard's farm, and they were babbling on grave matters concerning dolls--when suddenly they stopped as if rooted to the ground, and Marie, the younger, nestling close to her sister, exclaimed in a terrified voice, "Look!" The sight was, indeed, worth looking at. From between two willows that stood on the swamp's margin there rose something white, rendered indistinct by the damp mists; but on this white something there abruptly flashed in colors beautifully luminous the figure of a woman in blue and crimson with a child in her arms, and a golden crown on her head.

Often had Rose and Marie seen the image of this lady in pictorial missals and in the illuminated engravings used for decking chapels, and they instinctively clasped their little hands, whilst a voice reached them, saying, in clear, kind tones, "Rose and Marie, do not be frightened, but remember this day, and tell your parents what you have seen;" then the image vanished, and in its place broke out a rosy light so brilliant that it shed its rays for a hundred yards round the spot, and lit up the path of the two children as they hastened home breathless and pale to apprise their parents that they had seen the Virgin Mary. We need not dilate on the feelings of Farmer Nigot and his wife; enough that this prudent and religious couple, standing at the door of their house some minutes before their children's return, had remarked an extraordinary light beaming in the direction of the swamp, and had marvelled what it could be. When Rose and Marie related their adventure M. and Madame Nigot ceased to marvel, or rather their marvelling took a new turn, filling them with such awe and perplexity that they had lost all appetite for supper. Meanwhile, any sturdy stroller who should have walked down the road five minutes after the little girls had disappeared might have described unlucky M. Gaillard pelting towards his farm at a racing speed, with something like a white table cloth over one arm and a box on the other. He came apparently from the willow clump, and ran at such speed that in crossing the road he dropped something which fell with a crash, as of glass; and next morning the rural postman going his early rounds picked up on this precise spot the broken slide of a magic-lantern.

But this next morning was to usher in a day fated to be ever memorable in the annals of Gobemouchy, that waning town which we have already admired. Towards noon, M. Gaillard arrived at the mairie with some excitement in his manner, and announced that he had that morning discovered on the borders of his swamp a warm sulphur spring; and to prove his say he produced a bottle of the liquid, which the mayor and his clerk there present proceeded to taste. The report quickly spread through the town; but as sulphur springs are not rare in France the discovery of this one occasioned no commotion, until in the course of the afternoon another and much more startling rumor was circulated, to the effect that our Lady of Grace had appeared the night before to Rose and Marie Nigot on the exact site where the new spring was flowing. It seems that Farmer Nigot and his wife had been seen roaming all the morning with wizen faces near the presbytery, as if afraid to go in; but hearing of M. Gaillard's discovery, they had taken heart to call on the curé, and recount to him, in scared language, all that had happened. The curé, much surprised, forthwith took them, along with their two children, to be questioned by the mayor, and the mayor lost no time in summoning the juge de paix and the sub-prefect; but while this pair of important officials were investigating the wonder, who should turn up but a shepherd lad--quite simple, and therefore incapable of inventing--who, lying under a hedge the previous night, had witnessed the apparition too, and corroborated all the details furnished by Rose and Marie to the letter.

Now, you need scarcely be told that with respect to miracles we live in an unbelieving age, and therefore for every inhabitant of Gobemouchy who created the apparition there was another who laughed it to scorn; but undoubtedly the greatest scoffer of all in the town was M. Gaillard. This gentleman openly pooch-pooched the whole story, and to many this seemed indecent; for, after all, how could he account for the sulphur spring which had never existed before? M. Gaillard admitted that the spring had never existed before, but he absolutely declined to credit a miracle--only, in saying this, he let out that he was a republican and a freethinker. And this naturally took away all weight from his utterances, besides arraying against him the mayor, the sub-prefect, the clergy, and all the faithful. The attitude of the clergy, however, was in this, as in all circumstances, exceedingly discreet. The curé, having sent an express to the bishop, received orders to take no side in the controversy, but to hear evidence dispassionately, and to let time work. The curé obeyed, and had no cause to repent of the result; for before the week was out a vast number of other people, old ladies, nuns, school children, and several grown-up peasants appeared and swore that they had for some time past noticed miraculously brilliant lights glittering over the swamp; while some of the old ladies who had hastened to taste of the sulphur springs vowed that they had been instantaneously cured of long-standing rheumatics.

But whilst these declarations were keeping the minds of Gobemouchy in a condition of electric disturbance, and whilst the nuns of Rose and Marie's school were burning tapers day and night, and whilst a eminent chemist consulted as to the properties of the new spring was declaring it most potent for skin diseases, that uncommonly sceptical M. Gaillard received a visit from the rural postman, who, carefully closing the door, drew forth the magic-lantern slide and winked--such a wink! The poor man thought he would dumfound M. Gaillard; but judge of his emotion when that gentleman immediately caught him by the arm and dragged him off exultingly to the town hall, where in sight of the mayor he brawled, "Here, Mr. Mayor, is the secret of the whole matter--somebody has been hoaxing these poor children with a magic-lantern!" You think this forthwith dispelled all doubts? Ah, you little know the temper of a population who have been refreshed by a miracle. The profoundest contempt of all righteous minds fell upon M. Gaillard and upon the postman, who was dismissed from his place the following day for a heretic good-for-nought who had joined in a conspiracy. For was ever conspiracy plainer? Not content with poking his jeers at a providential apparition from which he was about to benefit, this infidel Gaillard wanted to trump up a cock-and-bull tale of a lantern, with the evident purpose of defaming the Church. Many who had not believed till that moment altered their minds out of disgust for so much cynicism; and monsignor the bishop, when informed of the facts, remarked with pious resignation that it was evident the freethinking party would take this miracle as a pretext for one of their customary and regrettable onslaughts upon the faith.

What more shall we add? Is it worth while to relate how the miracle, discussed in the Parisian press, became at once a political question, marshalling conservatives on one side and liberals on the other? How the inhabitants of Gobemouchy, incensed at the sarcasms of these liberals, and perceiving what profits were going to accrue to them from the miraculous spring, rose like one man with a petition to the court of Rome? and how the court of Rome solemnly confirmed the miracle with a bull urbi et orbi, thereby compelling all constituted authorities in France and the entire conservative party to put faith in it? On the spot where Gobemouchy was drooping so piteously in its decline now rises a beautiful renovated city, and on the site of those quondam marshes you may find rows of picturesque villas, a convent, a grotto, and a monumental church, to which one hundred thousand pilgrims flock every September. Rose and Marie have become nuns; the shepherd lad, adopted by a legitimist duke and educated at a first-class seminary, has blossomed out into a zealous priest; the cashiered postman joined the communists, and is at present in New Caledonia; and M. Gaillard, who made some fifty million francs out of those swamps, has turned the way of all prosperous men. He now calls himself Comte de la Source, is a conservative deputy, and a subject of constant edification to the faithful, for he has humbly recanted the errors of free thought.--London Daily Times.

ANTISLAVERY DOCUMENTS.

The undersigned have learned with much satisfaction that the valuable library of books and pamphlets relating to slavery and the antislavery movement in the United States, which was bequeathed to Cornell University by the late Samuel J. May, of Syracuse, has been made the nucleus of a collection of works on this subject, to be designated the "May Collection," in honor of its beloved and lamented founder. The collection has already received important accessions from the private libraries of friends in this country and in Great Britain, but it lacks many publications on the subject during the last forty years which are now out of print and to be found only in the possession of a few private individuals. It is especially deficient in the antislavery publications which emanated from Philadelphia, and it also lacks a file of the Liberator and other antislavery journals, the early volumes of which are now very difficult to obtain.

Regarding it of great importance that the literature of the antislavery movement both in this country and Great Britain should be preserved and handed down, that the purposes and the spirit, the methods and the aims of the abolitionists should be clearly known and understood by those who are to come after us, we earnestly recommend those of our old friends and coworkers in the antislavery cause who have any books, pamphlets, or newspapers relating to the question, for which they have no longer any use, to communicate with Prof. Willard Fisk, Librarian of Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, with reference to placing them in the "May Collection." The library, however, has no fund from which to purchase books, and is obliged to rely on the generosity of friends in making contributions.

We consider it especially fortunate in having the services of Prof. Fiske, whose admirable qualifications and ripe experience as a librarian are well known, and who has taken a most active and hearty interest in the "May Collection," and we believe that under his fostering care this latter will become the largest and best collection on the subject in America.

THE Watchman and Reflector says that a German scientist in 1788 wrote as follows: "The sun is really a kitchen fire, and the spots are great clouds of smoke and heaps of soot; consequently where there is a kitchen fire there must be meat to roast--such as godless people, Universalists, Atheists,--and the devil is the cook who turns the spit!"

ILLUSION.

The first word Baby said was "Bird!"
And landscape, dog, and tended herd,
That on the wall in picture hung,
One name must take from this new tongue.
And through the window every morn,
Her eyes, ere day was fairly born,
When birds from northern blasts had gone,
Seemed still to gaze with wonder on
The flocks which mother knew had flown
To warmer climes of southern zone.
'Twas "Bird! Bird! Bird!" from morn till eve:--
What should those little eyes deceive?

If Baby live till years we count,
And eager watch her brother mount,
In search of birdings, on the bough,
With eyes as wonder-full as now,
Will little seeker often moan
Because the naughty birds have flown?
And will she still-pursue the quest,
Though still in vain, from nest to nest?

The Baby's lessons, one by one
Unlearned as life's quick stages run;
The little maiden's hope deferred,
To find in every nest a bird--
These are but things that mother knows,
From life's beginning to its close,
Again and o'er again must be:
We look for what we never see.

Yet not to mock our restless sense
This ever-fleeing recompense;
The glory of life's forward aim
Is in the chase, and not the game;
Illusion is the bird that flies
To lure the soul to paradise.

The Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 14, 1875.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 1, TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

SUNDAY LECTURES.—The Editors of THE INDEX will lecture occasionally on Sundays, if desired, within a convenient distance of Boston.

THE NEW YORK Independent will please accept our acknowledgments for this catholic and courteous paragraph in its issue of January 7: "THE INDEX some time ago published an able article on 'The Relativity of Knowledge,' in criticism of the Spencerian philosophy of the Unknowable, and promised others if its readers did not feel inexcusably [inexpressibly?] bored by articles of this character.' We have waited three weeks, hoping for a continuation of the discussion, and are inclined to offer Mr. Abbot the hospitality of our columns, if his own readers do not feel interest in such themes." It is quite possible that some of our readers were "inexpressibly" bored by the article referred to, or would have been if they had read it; but we hoped they would not feel themselves to be bored by it "inexcusably," i.e. without excuse on our part. A liking for hard-tack comes "by grace" rather than "by nature," and should not be ruthlessly assumed. Perhaps we may at some time actually accept the Independent's invitation, and put to the test the mental digestive apparatus of its readers. It is always pleasanter to experiment on others than on the members of one's own family!

CATHOLIC OPPOSITION TO OUR SCHOOLS.

Bishop Regan, of Buffalo, in a controversy conducted through a local paper, recently made this statement of the Catholic view of the public school question:—

"We hold, then, as we said before, that children must be instructed in the knowledge of God and the divine law, made familiar with the gospel of Christ and the precepts of revealed religion, trained up from earliest years in the discipline, faith, and practice of Christianity. We are, therefore, an enemy, and, if you please, a stern, avowed, and uncompromising enemy, of any system of education for Catholic children in which religion, or religious instruction, the profession and practice of Christian faith, are neglected. We hold it to be the most sacred and bounden duty of parents to impart an early religious education to their offspring, and that for the great mass of mankind this education can be given only in the Christian school, where religion, Christianity, positive principles of faith, shall be impressed on the young mind by open, direct teaching, and actual daily practice. This cannot be done in a manner satisfactory to Catholics in public schools as constituted and managed here; for they are either godless or sectarian—godless by law, sectarian for the most part in practice,—and therefore Catholic parents cannot in conscience send their children to them. The law of the State positively declares that no religious instruction can be given within the hours allotted for school; therefore I have said they are, by law, godless. The State sets up a system of education and opens schools for its future citizens that, as far as the school goes, must send them out on society without a knowledge of God, or of his divine law, or of Christian truth and virtue. But the Christian instincts of the American people rebel against this educational heresy, this legalized atheism, this practical godlessness; and therefore, in violation of the law, they have their chapels and their Bibles, their prayers and their hymns, evidencing clearly enough to our mind that the spirit of the country is a Christian spirit, that the instincts of the people are religious, and that a Christian community instinctively feels that its youth should be educated in religious knowledge and imbued with Christian principles.

"I rejoice that it is so; for all this is in perfect harmony with Catholic sentiments. I am overjoyed when I hear from Christian pulpits and earnest Christian men moving appeals in behalf of Christian youth. Catholics are not the only citizens who wish their children schooled in Christian principles, and trained in Christian virtue and the early practice of the precepts of the gospel. We do not wish, then, to destroy the public schools; we wish to see them thoroughly and practically Christian; we wish every child educated in the public schools to possess and practise Christian faith. But what we allow and most sincerely wish for others, we ask and claim for ourselves."

In support of precisely the same view, the Brooklyn Catholic Review of October 20 had the following editorial paragraph:—

"Canada offers yet another humiliating illustration of the fact that justice, with the average Protestant, seems to be a mere matter of arithmetic—a thing to be clamored for when he is in the minority, to be denied when he is in the majority. In Canada, the majority, being Catholic, voted that the Protestant minority should have separate schools, and not be taxed to support those wherein the majority wished to have their children brought up, according to the wise king, 'in the way they should go'. In 'the States,' and in New Brunswick, where the Catholics are in a minority, they are taxed to support a school system they cannot conscientiously use, in the face of reiterated protests and manifest injustice."

Such quotations as these could be indefinitely multiplied. They express a consistent doctrine of education which is urged with great unanimity by the Catholic clergy and press of this country, and which, though as yet unaccepted by a portion of the Catholic laity represented by Mayor Kelley, of Richmond, Virginia, is nevertheless certain to command earlier or later the support of the great bulk of our Catholic population. The influence of the priests and bishops is thrown almost wholly in that direction and eventually shapes the convictions of the laity according to their will; while the nominal Catholics who set themselves up in defiance of this will are speedily forced either to submit or to apostatize. It is the part of sagacity to recognize the inevitableness of having to defend our present system of public secular education against the whole power of the Catholic Church, and to prepare ourselves in season either to strengthen or to surrender this system. First of all, we should candidly examine the causes of the growing Catholic repugnance to free secular education; next, we should consider what we have to urge on behalf of it against Catholic objections; and, lastly, we should begin betimes to take such steps as the interests of freedom, intelligence, and the public welfare demand.

What are the real causes of the Catholic protest against our public schools?

The primary and deepest cause is to be found in such facts as these. In 1836, Bishop England estimated the Catholic population of this country at 1,200,000, the total population being then 15,000,000; and he estimated that the Church had lost at least 3,750,000 members in the fifty years preceding 1836. "We ought," he said, "if there were no loss, to have five millions of Catholics. . . . The persons so lost are found amongst the various sects to the amount of thrice the number of the Catholic population of the whole country." [Works of Bishop England, vol. 3, pp. 126—127.] In a similar strain the New York Irish World said in its issue of July 25, 1874: "The Catholic population of the United States to-day is some 10,000,000. But the number of persons who ought to be Catholics, by right of descent from settlers in this country from the beginning, and who to-day are to be found among the sects or in the ranks of Nothingarianism, is estimated at 18,000,000." These figures are doubtless exaggerated, but they point to an indubitably large loss to the Catholic Church. Having this fact in view, and surmising that Mayor Kelley has "the tacit or half-uttered support of the Right Reverend Bishop of Richmond and of the Most Reverend Metropolitan of Baltimore," the New York Freeman's Journal, perhaps the ablest Catholic paper in the country, says boldly: "One thing is certain. Archbishops and bishops may be multiplied, and priests ordained, and thousands of churches built; but if our bishops do not, following the Vicar of Christ, forbid Catholics sending their children to godless schools, in fifty years from now the Catholic Church in the United States will be a shrivelled and ghastly skeleton—a dry waste after a wave of European emigration,—a scattered flock that false shepherds fed and fattened on, and left unsheltered from the wolves. These are hard words, but they are true, even if it be the rough editor of the Freeman's Journal that says them. And his God knows he would be glad not to have to say such words."

Now the primary cause of this apostasy of Catholic children from the faith of their parents is, as the last extract plainly intimates, the influence of the so-called "godless schools;" or, speaking more accurately, the influence of the education there acquired. "Ignorance is the mother of devotion," in the Catholic sense of the word; and knowledge is the death of

it. Moreover, association with non-Catholic children, contact with non-Catholic ideas, and so forth, counteract the influence of the Church to so large an extent, that Catholic children in the second and third generations very frequently become wholly de-catholicized; and the priests know it. Hence the persistent attempts to establish "parochial schools," to divide the public educational funds, to prevent the attendance of Catholic children at the public schools, to secure appropriations from the public treasury on behalf of Catholic schools, and so forth. It is the practical effect of unsectarian education in weaning children from devotion to the Catholic Church, and the consequent check to the Church's growth in numbers, power, and wealth, which lies at the bottom of this increasing hostility to the public school system; and it makes little difference whether the public schools are "godless" or "sectarian," "atheistic" or "Protestant." It is enough that they are not under the control of Catholic ecclesiastics to make the latter implacably opposed to permitting the children under their charge to attend them. They doubtless justify this opposition on the score of solicitude for the eternal welfare of the children; but it takes little penetration to see that they are quite as much concerned for the temporal welfare of the Church. Unless the whole tendencies of things are reversed,—unless non-sectarian education becomes the foster-mother of Catholic sectarianism,—we must expect to see every devotee of the Roman Catholic Church in this country arrayed against our present system of popular education; and the primary cause of this hostility must be found in the fact that our present school system is the chief obstacle in the march of the Church to universal dominion.

Next week we propose to resume this subject, and to consider especially the protest of the Catholic conscience against a public educational system uncontrolled by the Catholic Church.

GERRIT SMITH AND E. B. WARD.

For the first time since the Free Religious Association was organized, death has visited the circle of its officers. Within one week two of its Vice-Presidents have been thus removed. The death of Gerrit Smith is already known to the whole country and the world; for he was a man of world-wide reputation as a philanthropist. The death of Mr. Ward is as well known in all important business and financial circles throughout the country; for he was one of the kings of the business world.

When the Free Religious Association thought it advisable to enlarge the list of its Vice-Presidents so as to include a larger number of representative names throughout the country—the names of persons well known as standing for some phase of the free religious movement, and yet well known also in other walks of life,—the name of Gerrit Smith at once presented itself among the first to be selected for such a list. For the name of Gerrit Smith, for more than a generation, had been prominently identified not only with every public and private cause of philanthropy, but with the cause of reason in religion as opposed to the external authority of sect or creed or church or Bible. He stood, therefore, among the very foremost of living exponents of free religious ideas. He not only had a deep interest in religious matters, but he frequently wrote and spoke upon them, and always in behalf of the freest use of reason on all religious questions. And then by his philanthropy, which was not confined to one phase of social reform alone, but was a thorough and abiding principle of conduct connecting him with all movements for the welfare of men, he showed those practical results into which free religious ideas should issue if they have a genuine worth. Take him all in all, then, he came very near what might be regarded as the model of a free religious character. The two watchwords of his life were Liberty and Humanity: Liberty for the bodies and souls of men, liberty for all rational inquiry, thought, and utterance, on all questions whether of politics or religion; Humanity, or a spirit binding the free individual in the fine bond of good-will, charity, brotherhood, and mutual helpfulness with all his kind.

Theologically, Mr. Smith might perhaps have been classed as a Christian Theist. Yet he was a man of such independent position and convictions that it is not easy to put him in any class. He certainly belonged to no sect. And he hailed the organization of the Free Religious Association, and readily assented to stand as one of its Vice-Presidents, because he saw that it was a movement against sectarianism, dogmatism, and superstition, and in favor of a free, rational, and humane religion. To use the old dis-tion, he was a believer in Natural Religion, but not in Revealed Religion. And he kept the Christian name, not because he cared much to insist on the term, but because he believed that it was a name properly applied to the kind of religion inculcated in the moral and spiritual teachings of Jesus, which he accepted as the highest phase of Natural Religion. But any form of dogmatism, creed-ism, priestcraft, and any kind of spiritual authority other than that which appeals to the free reason and conscience, he instinctively discarded, under whatever sacred name it might appear. And because he discarded so much that is commonly thought essential to Christianity, he was not regarded as having any right to the Christian name by the vast majority of the Christian world. Practically, his life came nearer to the primitive Christian type than can often be found in modern Christendom,—sharing, as he did, his large fortune with the needy, forgiving and blessing his enemies, when assailed on one cheek turning the other, making no respect of persons at his hospitable board, but inviting black and white, the elegant millionaire and the humble mechanic to sit down together; and, in the midst of opportunities for self-indulgent ease, living a life of great simplicity, temperance, benevolent industry, and self-denial; yet notwithstanding these traits of character, modelled on the precepts of the "Sermon on the Mount," the Christian sects almost without exception were debarred from calling him Christian because of the dogmatic meanings which they give to the word.

Mr. Ward—or Captain Ward, as he was more familiarly known in his own community—was a man of very different temperament and career from Gerrit Smith. In the East he was little known except among men of business and finance; and there were those who did not understand, when he was proposed as a Vice-President of the Free Religious Association, who he was or why he should be chosen. But in the West his name was a familiar synonyme for enterprise, sagacity, indomitable energy, and honesty, and was a tower of strength in the business world. Unlike Mr. Smith, who began with a fortune, Mr. Ward began with nothing but his hands and his brain. He started, after emigrating from his birth-place in Vermont, in his business career as a cabin-boy on some humble lake craft. He became, by his mental and physical vigor, by his wise courage and his capacity for invention and organization, one of the leading spirits in developing the material enterprise of the West, and has died the possessor of a property estimated at several millions. But he was a man of strong intelligence, and of benevolent heart and public spirit. And like Mr. Smith, he too was a believer in reason and freedom in religion, and interested in all questions pertaining to religious progress, yet stood outside of all sects. His home, luxuriantly appointed, was opened with a large hospitality. Two or three years ago, he had formed a plan of building a fine and spacious Hall in the city of his adoption, Detroit, to be used for free religious meetings on Sunday, and generally for popular culture by lectures, reading-rooms, library, etc. But probably the financial depression has prevented the execution of this benevolent project. NOTES FROM WEST WISCONSIN.

Market: Copper-mine stock, dull and drooping; mineral waters, upward tendency; religion, first grade, steady, with hell-ward inclination; second grade, lively demand in certain quarters, no sale in others.

If the price of corn governs marriages, as Buckle says, the price of wheat governs revivals. At least, it is so out West. Wheat is down, and revivals are up. We might make a see-saw or sliding scale of values: As grain goes up, the revivalist's God goes down below par, and vice versa.

For instance, last Sunday (January 3) seven persons were baptized in the river here by cutting a hole in the ice; thermometer at fifteen degrees below zero; wheat is seventy cents per bushel. Now let wheat advance to about eighty cents, and about four would go down into the water in order to get up into heaven. Let wheat jump up to $1.25 per bushel, not a man would stand up for Jesus. If he wanted a bath, he would take a Turkish one, or a simple tub with tepid water, and pay for it in cash.

But wheat is down; and, as a consequence, all around us revivals are up and rising. As the creditor comes in at the front door, the frightened debtor flees from the back door to the bosom of his Savior—who washes away, not his debts, but his trouble about them. This is a "compensation" Emerson does not philosophize about.

We said second grade religion (as we weigh the grain of it) is lively. Not only are revivals throughout the country symptomatic of a rising market, but we have just had at Fond-du-lac, in Wisconsin, what is called an Evangelical Alliance. The object of the Alliance was to ally all denominations more closely together by the bond of a common creed; and they succeeded in adopting a creed, though not without resolute opposition from a respectable minority. How the vote stood we have not learned. The encouraging feature of the conference is that Dr. Dudley and Rev. Mr. Reed, of Milwaukee, without question the ablest ministers in that city, if not in the State, together with a Rev. Mr. Case (Methodist), of Fond-du-lac, pastor of the largest church in that city, were among the number that refused to adopt the articles of faith.

The latter gentleman in his pulpit, on the Sunday following the Alliance, severely castigated the Convention for their narrowness and dogmatism, and vindicated his liberal policy. Of the spirit of the clergy in general he is reported as saying that, "When the charge of bigotry and intolerance is brought against the clergy, we are unable to repel it; for the history of the Church, in all ages, is but a record of clerical intolerance. Every inch of the progress of the ages has been contested by the clergy. The creeds and confessions of faith which have burdened the Church in all its history stand to-day, like the desolate columns of Egyptian ruins, monuments of the dogmatism and bigotry of the Church and the clergy in the past." More truth about the Church than one generally hears in Christian pulpits, and, coming from a Methodist minister, it raises hopes that some good may come to radical religion out of that Nazareth of faiths.

During the discussion concerning the adoption of a doctrinal basis by the Alliance, a Rev. Mr. McLean, from Beloit, hit Liberal Christianity "under the belt," in the opinion of Rev. Mr. Case, who strikes from his pulpit counter-blows that ought to knock wind out of his clerical brother.

When Mr. McLean compared the "liberal faith to a bag of jelly without the bag," Mr. Case retorts that a "bag of jelly without the bag is preferable to a jelly-bag without the jelly;" and he prefers to have the jelly of modern thought, with its little cohesiveness and consistency, rather than the old bag, dry as a pepper-pod, which John Calvin carried his sour jelly in. As to the doctrine of eternal punishment, Messrs. Case, Reed, and Dudley would not stand on a platform that put that plank in. The Alliance, nevertheless, voted for the plank. So it would appear that these gentlemen are left out in the cold, even as were many of the radicals, when Unitarians put the Lord-and-Savior-Jesus-Christ plank in their denominational platform.

As to Prof. Swing, he is off the rack of heresy, but he seems to be tortured by some other rack. His sermons are published every week in the Chicago Times, and given the leading place; but frequently they do not deserve it. They are indeed always characterized by sweetness of spirit and breadth of sympathy, and by a kind of Indian-summer atmosphere, which invite repose; but they lack much of the freshness, poetry, and finish of his sermons last winter, while they have become more sentimental and especially lachrymose, until one sometimes wishes this David would hang his harp on the willows, and doctor his liver. We tire of one perpetual minor key. A few extracts from a sermon of two weeks ago will give you an idea of his state of health: "The more days the year sends us in which we can meet together in a Christian love, and brotherhood, and child-like simplicity, the better; for the world deeply needs a religion of less inquiry and more sentiment." In our opinion there is too much sentiment and too little sense in the Christian religion. In his retrospect of the year, he says gloomily: "Nobody has seemed to be on the side of peace and good-will, so far as the Church is concerned. Unsupported by the State, unsupported by the leading men of science, unsupported by a large portion of the daily press, we have added to our weakness by stirring up domestic broils. Each denomination has suffered from some form of internal war. Instead of converting sinners, they have lacerated themselves and each other. It is the only year out of the past decade whose termination I personally hail with joy. All the comfort we can glean comes from the fact that no rivers of blood have been shed by any of these denominations in the feuds of these latter days."

Now why so much gloomy repining? No doubt what he says is true. No year has been so full of Church trials, Church turmoils, and Church scandal, as the past; but, excepting the scandal, which God knows is black enough, the Church trials are nothing that one should whine over.

Prof. Swing ought to lift up his voice in thanking that he is, first, a heretic, and, secondly, that he is a free man and an independent preacher. It is true he may enjoy nevermore those sweet communions at conferences with dear brothers and lovely sisters in Christ, and he can only chew over in memory those sandwiches and baked beans that he used to roll as sweet morsels under his tongue, when he loved Dr. Patton and Dr. Patton loved him, with that "Christian" love he speaks of. But whatever pleasures of fellowship he may have sacrificed, he has gained intellectual liberty,—a possession to the strong, brave, original mind far dearer than the privilege of quarterly collations, fraternal sympathy, and greetings, and a name in the Year Book, desirable as these may be. Instead of shedding "tears, idle tears," over a retrospect of Church trials and turmoil, let Prof. Swing rejoice and thank God for the day that Dr. Patton slipped from his neck the ecclesiastical halter, and turned him loose to range at his own sweet will through the green pastures and beside the still waters of world-thoughts.

If, as some say, this is the freedom of the wild ass, be it so: we will take such pasturage in preference to the fodder doled out in the Church stables.

Notwithstanding the Chicago Times gives to Swing three columns every week, it has severely criticised some of his sermons. It christened his new church the Church of the "Holy Ambiguity," because it is in theology a hybrid, as it surely is. The trouble with the Professor may be mostly in his liver; still we are disposed to think he is not quite weaned from his old love, and occasionally feels homesickness for the church that is home no more. But he is a kind man, and doing a good work.

A MAGNIFICENT CHANCE FOR PROTEST.

At the request of his society, Mr. Potter has just given to the public two discourses preached by him last November on "Some Aspects of Unitarianism in its Past and Recent History." They contain utterances which ought to, and perhaps may, call out frank statements from the Unitarian ministers and journals; though we have little expectation that the leading points made will be otherwise than evaded by the latter. "The least said, the soonest mended"—seems to be the Gilded Rule of Unitarian journalism. Nevertheless, Mr. Potter's discourses must set every thinking Unitarian busily at work in his own mind. Some facts are presented which "will not down" at any one's bidding, however painful they may be:—

1. Mr. Potter's name was officially struck from the authorized register of Unitarian clergymen a year ago, simply because he declined to profess himself a Christian.

2. This action of the Secretaries was indorsed by the American Unitarian Association at its annual meeting last May.

3. It was again practically indorsed by the National Conference at its biennial meeting last September.

4. Mr. Potter now tells his society (and we think no less truly than bravely) that they are "publicly implicated in the heresies of [their] pastor;" and for this reason Dr. Bellows' resolution of sympathy towards this society was emphatically voted down by the National Conference.

5. "The resolution having been proposed solely as a test of fellowship," says Mr. Potter (and again we agree with him), "the decisive vote to table it became virtually and unmistakably an act of disfellowship and exclusion on the part of the Conference towards this society."

6. The Council of the Conference made special efforts to enlarge its fellowship in certain other directions, [and the Conference even went so far as to appoint delegates to the Orthodox Congregational Convention]; which makes the virtual disfellowshipping of the New Bedford society still more apparent and significant.

7. "Yet by the Unitarian Association," continues Mr. Potter, "you are still recognized as a Unitarian society in regular standing in the Unitarian denomination. You will find in the pews to-day the annual printed Appeal for funds, which that Association sends out to the churches on its list, and which its Secretary has recently sent to me for this distribution among you. It would appear as if the Secretary had not heard of the action of the Saratoga Conference against fellowshipping this society, though more than two months have passed since the Conference was held, or else he does not choose to heed even the 'moral authority' which the Conference once alleged was the only kind of authority that was to be recognized in its votes."

Now we submit that, if there was the slightest reason a year ago for questioning Mr. Potter as to his Christian position, there was a great deal stronger reason for questioning the New Bedford society this year on the same point. We approved the compilers' action last year, because we accepted the reason offered—a regard for "honesty" and "accuracy" in preparing purely statistical tables; but what must we say now, in view of the facts above presented? It is transparently clear that a regard for statistical "honesty" and "accuracy" required that the question then put to Mr. Potter should be now put to his society. Why was it not put? The words we have above italicized tell why. The sending of that Appeal to the New Bedford society was virtually a speech, which may be thus paraphrased:—

"We do not think you sufficiently Christian to be fellowshipped by us, when in solemn Conference assembled. Your position is too suspicious, at the best, to permit us to offer you our hands. But your money is Christian enough to satisfy the most fastidious of us conservatives. So we forbear to question you unpleasantly, lest your non-Christian pride should be so severely piqued as to make you withhold your Christian dollars. Please be so gracious as to send us your greenbacks, and we will gratefully stow them away in the same pocket into which we have thrust all our scruples as to your Christianity!"

And this is what organized Unitarianism has come to! Shall there be no brave and generous rebuke from Unitarians themselves of such a travesty on religion? When, nearly seven years ago, we felt constrained to request the erasure of our name from the Year Book list, it was with great inward pain that we severed our connection with what we thought (and still think) a company of noble and high-minded men and women. But if they can endure to be implicated in such a policy as this without being smothered with chagrin and shame, there is more nobleness and high-mindedness in the one man they have cast out of their fellowship than in all that remain.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—As I conclude your readers continue to feel interested in the cause of the Bishop of Natal, I cannot do better than add something to my last letter about the present excitement.

The statement that the Dean of Westminster had invited Bishop Colenso to preach in the Abbey was premature. I took it from a daily paper called the Hour, which was foolish enough to shed crocodile tears over the supposed catastrophe.

The Bishop of Natal, however, has been invited by the Dean, and at the present moment I am not empowered to make public his lordship's intended reply. We shall have it in the Times before long.

Since the affair at Oxford, however, we have had two more cases of inhibition which deserve comment. First came a pastoral letter from Bishop Wordsworth, of Lincoln, "earnestly exhorting and entreating 'his clergy' in the name of the Great Head of the Church, and for the sake of the souls purchased by his blood, to assist me in guarding the congregations of all churches and chapels under my episcopal care against the erroneous teaching of the said Dr. Colenso, who must not be permitted to preach in any of the said churches or chapels until he repents of his errors, and openly retracts the same, which may God in his mercy grant, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

This was a very cheap and summary way of keeping the wolf from the fold; and I leave your readers to judge what a splendid chance Bishop Wordsworth gave me of pounding away at the "Great Head" which he so carelessly exposed.

(I hope no one dreams that I identify "the Great Head of the Church" with either Jesus of Nazareth, or Queen Victoria.)

The Bishop of Lincoln's reasons for prohibiting Bishop Colenso were—to persons of ordinary common sense—simply ridiculous:—

(1.) In 1863, forty-two bishops had asked Bishop Colenso to resign.

(2.) Convocation had condemned his writings.

(3.) Bishop Gray had sentenced him to be deposed (which proceedings and sentence were declared by Her Majesty's Privy Council to be absolutely null and void in law).

(4.) Synods here and synods there had pronounced Bishop Gray's sentence to be just and right, and the notorious Lambeth Conference contained fifty-six bishops who said so likewise.

All these formidable declarations and this array of Episcopal indignation was nothing more, in fact, than a mere game or comedy, so far as it affected the Bishop of Natal's legal position.

In a letter to the Times, Mr. Westlake, Q. C., points out that these inhibitions of Bishop Colenso are so many acts of avowed rebellion against the law of the land, inasmuch as they are grounded on a refusal to submit to the decision of our highest legal tribunal.

As Bishop Colenso has many clerical friends, he was soon invited to preach in London; and last Sunday a vast concourse of people assembled within and without the church of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, expecting the bishop to preach according to advertisement. At the eleventh hour (literally, as service begins at that time), a churchwarden or other official comes forward, and announces from the steps of the chancel that Bishop Colenso will not preach there, having been inhibited by the Bishop of London!

Several persons who were present bear testimony to the fact that this announcement was received by expressions of bitter disapprobation, amounting to positive hissing.

I am not surprised at this; nor can I be at all pleased at any loss of self-respect which hissing in such a place as a church manifests. But it does show the depth of indignant feeling stirred by the conduct of the Bishop of London.

He belongs to the Evangelical school, and I believe does not share the sacerdotal assumptions of his brother of Lincoln; but I fear that he too has absurd notions about "the Great Head of the Church," and the said Head's injunctions to persecute.

As a chronicler, I am bound to tell you that Mr. Stopford Brooke took upon himself to belaud the mode adopted by the Bishop of London to prevent Bishop Colenso from preaching. He had sent him (Mr. Brooke) a letter the night before, asking him to stop Colenso from preaching, and at the same time using oleaginous expressions about Colenso's heroic defence of the Natal chief.

Now what kindness or consideration was shown by the Bishop of London to deserve the favorable notice of Mr. Brooke I cannot conceive. To me, the course adopted was extremely shabby, and I will tell you why I think so.

First, it was taking a mean advantage of the Bishop of Natal's fine sense of propriety and dignity; inasmuch as Bishop Jackson knew that Colenso would not condescend to do that which by law he could be prevented doing by taking advantage of the informality of the proceedings.

Secondly, the Bishop of London saved himself some time, trouble, and money, by not issuing a formal inhibition.

An inhibition is a queer, quaint document, generally of parchment, which has to be engrossed by a lawyer's clerk, copied I know not how many times, registered here and there, sealed with the Episcopal seal, and costing some pounds in its preparation and delivery.

The Bishop of London either purposely avoided this expensive method, or he was belated and had not time to issue it on Saturday night. In the latter case, he certainly deserved no thanks; in the former case, he deserved animadversion.

One can only wonder in amazement how bishops can recklessly pursue this kind of conduct in the face of the perils threatening the Church. Positively their only chance is in manifesting a spirit of charity and universal toleration; and it is the very opposite of this that seems to inspire them whenever occasion arises for action.

I am glad to be able to add the rumor that the Archbishop of Canterbury has written to Bishop Colenso, saying that his status as a Bishop of the Church of England is as good as that of any other bishop on the bench. Also that Bishop Temple—the deserter—has notified that he will not inhibit the Bishop of Natal from the diocese of Exeter.

I am sorry to say Bishop Colenso sails for Natal on Christmas day; but if his life be spared (which so many of us earnestly pray) he will come back to this country, and put finally to the test of law the rights which he claims, and the insolent assumptions and aggressions by which those rights have been disputed and invaded.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E., Dec. 19, 1874.

P.S.—The Bishop of Natal has declined to preach in Westminster Abbey. I will send you a copy of the Times containing his reply to the Dean, which I hope, with the other letters, you will find room to publish.

PROSCRIPTION FOR OPINION IN THE COURTS.

On Jan. 4, in this city, in the Marine Court, before Judge McAdam, in the suit of Achsah M. Truman vs. Woodhull, Claflin & Co., to recover money claimed to have been fraudulently converted, a man who did not wish to testify, but who could not but be willing to if it was necessary in order to ensure justice, was called to the stand as a witness. His proposal to affirm called out from the attorney for the defendants the question, "Have you conscientious scruples against taking an oath?" to which the witness replied that he had, and that he always affirmed. "Are you an Infidel?" "What would popularly be called so?" "Are you an Atheist?" "What would popularly be called so?" Thereupon defendants' counsel insisted that the witness be excluded, and the judge so ordered, but remarked that he would look into the matter. At a subsequent stage the judge himself called the witness again to the stand, and, as his justification and ground for now accepting him, read from an open book of authorities: "No person shall be denied his right to testify on account of his religious ideas." "But," interposed the defendants' attorney, "that means that he must have religious ideas. No matter what they are; if they are those of a Mohammedan he can testify; but the witness has none." The judge then turned to witness and asked, "Have you any religious ideas?" "I am an asceticist, and accept that postulate of science which makes the universe the only Infinite, Eternal, and Self-Existent." "Well, you can't testify." And against the earnest protest of the plaintiff, who claimed the evidence as indispensable, and that the jury ought to be permitted to hear it and allow it such weight as they saw fit, the witness was a second time sent to his seat. This involved not individuals nor persons, but principles, justice, the entire community, as if the witness had been any other than my own humble self.

If by "religious ideas" be meant those of the Infinite, Eternal, and Self-Existent, then only he can have them who thus accepts the scientific doctrine of the universe; for no being can be Infinite, nor, then, Eternal nor Self-Existent—and so the mere God-believers have no religious ideas. And if the need in a witness is to be honest, that was the very reason why I was not allowed to testify,—because I was honest, and so honest; for, when the judge asked if I had any religious ideas, if I had replied, "I believe in the Infinite, Eternal, and Self-Existent," he would have said, "Then you can proceed," deeming that tantamount to my having faith in some kind of a God; but I could not let him labor under that false impression, and so had to tell him I recognized only a universe; and for being thus true to him, to the defendants and to all parties, I was ruled out; for being honest I could not testify in a court of justice. But Mrs. Woodhull was not so scrupulous; for when she was asked if she believed in a Supreme Being, "Most assuredly I do!" she said, glibly; and when asked if she believed in a future state of rewards and punishments, "Most assuredly I do!" she again exclaimed, though she knew she would be understood by that jury as asserting faith in two doctrines, neither of which she believes one whit more than I do; and though she made these two statements after she had sworn her solemn oath—as I said everything beforehand, for I was not permitted to take the affirmation. And if the Young Men's Christian Association and the God-in-the-Constitution party seek to proscribe unbelief in the courts, yet here was Victoria C. Woodhull actually doing the same thing; for in both these cases it was her attorney who accomplished the end, and it was of course she who inspired and controlled the attorney. And perhaps it is only due to the great issue involved in this proscription in court—an issue which I felt I had no right to prevent nor evade by consenting to give testimony except openly, as an out-and-out Atheist—to say that for twenty-five years I have lived with these ideas of Infinite, Self-Existent, Eternal, and Immortal (all as pertaining to the universe) forever in my intellect, in my heart, confronting me almost every moment, engaging all the powers of my being in their solution as the greatest of possible problems, and affecting, controlling, deciding every act of my life, almost to every thought and emotion, even so that I have frequently been characterized as the most religious man to be found (though denying that I had any religion); and this life I shall live till I die, never able to afford to violate it, though I therefore be excluded from the witness-box forever.

JOSEPH TREAT.

NEW YORK, Jan. 6, 1875.

[We know nothing whatever of this particular lawsuit; but we feel bound to protest against this refusal of a New York court to admit the testimony of a witness merely because of his religious views. Can the liberals of the country look on unmoved at such a violation of religious freedom, and feel no impulse to aid the agitation for the "Religious Freedom Amendment"? We do not consider ourselves an atheist; but we take our stand publicly by the side of any and every atheist, until he has every political, civil, and social right allowed him that is conceded to the most Orthodox of the Orthodox. If the facts above stated are, as we suppose them to be, true, they are a disgrace to this age. We record here our most emphatic protest, though it should remain as solitary as Robinson Crusoe.—ED.]

ILLITERATE VOTERS.

DEAR INDEX:—

As some of your readers appear not to understand the little article of mine on "Ignorant Voters," which you were kind enough to reprint, I should like to say that I am not opposed to the voting of women as such, but only to that of illiterates as such. I should like to have as many intelligent voters as possible, both male and female, and as few illiterate and uninformed ones as possible, both male and female. I would gladly assist in disfranchising every man who cannot read and write, and I treat illiterate women just as I would illiterate men. I could cordially cooperate with any one who is working for the admission of educated women and no others to the franchise. Indeed, I should be glad to know of any one who is ready to take the lead in such a movement. I should also be glad to know if I am mistaken in supposing the Women's Rights people to be, as a body, in favor of the enfranchisement of female illiterates. This I must oppose, as I believe that the tyranny of party managers, already almost incompatible with individual liberty in politics, would be so much increased by the control of the votes of more than two millions of utterly illiterate, and perhaps as many more almost equally inexperienced females, that the nominal possession of the ballot would be of little benefit to intelligent and independent men and women. But let me quote what I said recently in the Chicago Tribune on this subject:—

"It is true that enfranchisement would teach women politics; but we have quite as many such pupils at present as there is room for in the national school. Men do not learn so rapidly and universally as to lead to the hope that women, in their existing inferiority in both general and special culture, would at present be able to improve themselves so rapidly as to compensate for the harm of having the average capacity of the votes so immensely diminished. And yet the advantage of having all the women interested in the public welfare, if only to keep all the men so, would be so great that these considerations are valid only against the immediate and complete, but not against the gradual, establishment of Female Suffrage. The main gain of the agitation hitherto has been in leading women to read the newspapers and attend public meetings. The more general these habits become, the faster will the only real objection to women's voting disappear. The increase of historical study in the schools and colleges is making women, as well as men, more fit to vote; and this fitness will increase rapidly as soon as what is called compulsory education, but which might better be called Guaranteed Education, shall be established in all the States. Every year increases the average capacity of women to vote with profit to the State and honor to themselves. It is certain that, the longer woman stays away from the polls, the greater will be her ability to appear there for the first time as a queen. What the ballot will do for women depends mainly on what they do for themselves before they cast it. This is not telling them not to go into the water before they have learned to swim. It is advising them to learn to swim before they ask the nation to employ them as pearl-divers; for good government is a deep-sea pearl never found by untaught hands."

TOO MUCH SPIRITUALISM.

OTTAWA, CANADA, Jan. 4, 1875.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Sir,—I regretted to see so much space taken up in a recent number of THE INDEX with two lengthy lucubrations on Spiritualism. This is so much the more surprising, considering the recent exposures, at Philadelphia and elsewhere, of the meanness and quackery of the whole subject. It may be thought desirable to have full discussion in THE INDEX on all subjects bearing on religion; still there ought to be lines drawn somewhere as to the relative importance of such topics.

You would not like to have your columns occupied with Methodistical instances and proofs of special providences, or Romish accounts of the cures and miracles wrought at the shrine of our Lady of Lourdes, or any other exhibition of the love of the miraculous which is so constant a trait in people who are ignorant of science, however glibly—like your correspondents—they may talk about it. If you think there are reasons for giving more consideration to Spiritualism than to other superstitions, you ought at least to add some remarks of your own, as you are in the habit of doing in other cases, to guard your readers against supposing that you acquiesce in the opinions of your correspondents. It is amusing to read the somewhat contemptuous references to the superstitions of others made by these writers, as if there was the slightest difference in kind betwixt their beliefs and those of the uneducated mass of human beings, who believe firmly in ghosts, and put herbs under their pillows on Hallow Eve, in order that they may see spirits; who go to old women to have their fortunes told by the lines in their hands, and have guardian angels attending them from birth to old age. A poor Irish hodman, believing, on the authority of his priest, that he has a guardian angel constantly with him, and believing in him not a whit less than the angel has no power to prevent him falling with his bricks from the ladder, is a far more respectable object than a Spiritualist who has renounced authority and talks of science, with his foolish table-turnings and rappings, and his other spiritual manifestations which take place in the dark, and which have so often been traced to imposture.

It is singular that Spiritualists should be so ready to drag in the word science into their writings. Ever since its dawn, in the fifteenth century, modern science has been the uncompromising enemy of all forms of Spiritualism. Its greatest triumph was the destruction of the universal belief in witchcraft. When we think of the horrors which sprung from this belief, the tortures and the murders which it brought on poor humanity, we may well thank our stars that modern Spiritualism will have nothing to do with the "diabolic." The late address of Professor Tyndall is but one of many symptoms which show that the time is not far distant, when science will make an end of the long-lived, superstitious belief that there can be such a thing as spiritual existence apart from organization.

Yours,
J. G. WHYTE.

"A fair field and no favor"—is the principle that guides us in the admission of articles. No one of our habitual readers is ignorant that we are wholly sceptical in our own opinion of Spiritualism; but we are quite as sceptical in our opinion of the Materialism expressed in the closing sentence of our correspondent. It is our wish and purpose to speak with respect of both, seeing as we do that both are compatible with respect for freedom of thought and speech, and being as we are in strong sympathy with all freedom-lovers. Dogmatic Spiritualism and dogmatic Materialism are equally repellent, however. Provided the appeal to reason is always in order, there is no ground for impatience; and the best way is to treat all opinions with good humor, when no claim of "authority" is set up. To over-confident assertions in either direction touching the "other world," we have no reply but a cheerful—"I don't know: do you?" Time upsets all delusions in the end, even the delusion of fancying we know when we do not know; and we trust our correspondent will not suppose that even Professor Tyndall has abolished ignorance yet.—ED.]

A LETTER FROM MISS HOLLEY.

HOLLEY SCHOOL, LOTTSBURGH, Va.,
December 29, 1874.

REV. P. FISK:—

Dear Sir,—The Boston Journal and THE INDEX are perpetual reminders of the pleasant debt we owe your kindness. They do indeed light up this obscure nook of old Virginia with a steady, genial, Northern gleam very delightful to me. And I thank you again and again.

Old Nelson Diggs exclaimed one day, on calling to see us: "What a place that North is! Whatever you call for is sure to come!—Money, clothes, farming-tools, things to keep house with, books, papers, food to eat. The North has got 'em all! Such as this Viginny never see befo'!"

And now you, Northern friends, have given this good, nice schoolhouse. The rebels tauntingly call it "Nigger Hall." As if Virginia's "laugh" could have any dread for me!

Christmas day was beautiful, from dawn to setting. Thermometer fifty degrees, and nearly three hundred glad souls gathered in the new schoolhouse—all to receive a gift from off our holly tree. The Stars and Stripes floated from our flag-staff on the cupola, an eloquent and suggestive sight. I read some of the grand old Hebrew Psalms, showing the Divine care of the poor and lowly—of which our school and the new schoolhouse are striking illustrations. The scholars gave creditable recitations. Novella Middleton rendered Wendell Phillips' idea of "American Nationality" with a distinct power that you would be surprised and pleased to hear. All the exercises were of the liveliest interest to all present. And oh! how wonderful are the signs of improvement in these minds and faces! The changes from the rags, tags, and patch-work, in which we found them six years ago, to decent garments, is not more visible than the light of intelligence and marks of mental growth in their countenances, bearing, and manner. Not in vain have they striven to break the chains of ignorance with which slavery had bound them so tightly; and what a great reward it is to us for all our toil and pains! My heart is full to-day of thankfulness for all the past, including trials and persecution; for these have helped on the people's growth and education as quiet prosperity could not have done. We look forward to more rapid progress, having, as we joyfully feel, a great ally in the new and better schoolhouse, now under our own control. The noble aid which you and other Northern friends have given to this end will, I believe, be fully justified by the results.

The interior of our new schoolhouse wears quite a New England aspect, with its thirty double desks and sixty chairs (all second-hand) from Cambridge. All were in place for our scholars; of course, could not seat a quarter of our Christmas company; but they are admirable for us, and fixed the gaze and wonder of all eyes, and did a grand part to speak to all present—both white and black—of a superior civilization elsewhere, and to gladden these poor colored people with hopes to share in its spread. Several of our faithful colored men made sensible and appreciative speeches. Your heart would have been touched deeply to hear them. Even many of our poor white neighbors dressed themselves up to look and behave their best, and attended our Christmas celebration. To each one I made a present off the tree. The face of a little dumb boy was like morning light breaking, as I handed him a very pretty picture. His mother quietly told me, "He can't speak!"

We hope we are breaking the crust of miserable prejudice, by asking these white people to our school festivals. They listened as I told over the story of old John Brown, and his death on a Virginia scaffold, with a curious interest, as if it was an entirely new story to them. When I concluded with stating that this beautiful schoolhouse was one of the blessed results following his being "faithful unto death," and loving his black neighbor as himself, the house was so quiet one might have heard a pin drop.

Always your very grateful and obliged friend,
SALLIE HOLLEY.

THE POLITICAL PARTY OF THE FUTURE—"NO WOMAN NAMED!"

MR. ABBOT:—

In THE INDEX of December 10 you published a thoughtful discourse by Wm. J. Potter—"Lessons from the Elections,"—near the close of which are hints of "some of the principles of this party of the future," which is hoped for as a possibility growing out of our perturbed political condition. I find in these hints much of value; some things, perhaps, to which I could not quite subscribe, but I do not write to criticise them, but rather to note a singular omission.

Are there not millions of women fit to take part in these large affairs? Will not government inevitably be fragmentary, imperfect, and unjust, so long as the womanly element, the half of our humanity, the presence and influence of which must be had for harmony, perfection, and true growth, is ignored and put out of sight, made subject but not equal? Is it Tennyson who says:—

"Millions of throats will bawl for civil rights,
No woman named?"

Surely no "party of the future" can be more than a sham, without this equality of woman as one of its aims and ideals and demands.

Truly yours,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 27. G. B. STEBBINS.

ANOTHER "COMEOUTER."

NEW BEDFORD, Mass., Jan. 3, 1875.

On the last Sunday of 1874, W. S. Bell, minister of the Universalist society of this city, preached his farewell to the Christian ministry. Mr. Bell's outgrowth from sectarianism has been rapid. Four years since, he left the Methodist pulpit for a course of liberal theological study at Harvard, and soon afterwards began his ministry here. Mr. Bell has good parts and information. His new position cannot be otherwise than conscientious, for he has counted the cost of discarding Christianity, to follow wherever truth may lead. The wealthy, of whatever belief, fare easily; but the impecunious clergyman or layman shoulders a heavier than pilgrim's "pack," when, in a Christian community, he has arowedly outgrown Christianity.

The writer, addressing some radical words to a lad, was thus rebuked by a sectarian bystander: "Don't utter such sentiments to that boy. Adopting them, he can never have standing nor society." The spontaneous rebuke was too nearly true. Poor indeed are the prospects of an "infidel" tradesman of small means, unbolstered by the adventitious aid of secret societies. Sectarians will not buy even a shoestring of him, and rich radicals purchase everything from wealthy dealers, uncaring that the brother sceptic needs trade that he may live. To his lot, even that of the clergyman seceding into Free Religion is easy. Good parts and a wide field bestead the brain-worker. As for Mr. Bell, let lovers of freedom support his manly stand.

CHARLES HAZELTINE.

PERDITION OF INFANTS.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Many have been the assertions and denials as to the statements of Calvinistic ministers concerning the condition of the children of unconverted parents in the coming life. David Howe, now seventy-five years old, tells me that a Mr. Williston, of Tunbridge, Vt., some forty-two years ago, in preaching the funeral sermon of a child of his, said: "There is no doubt that hell is lined with the infants of ungody parents." Mr. Howe is a man of truth. He is sure that the phrase—"not a span long"—was added. He says Mr. Williston was a Presbyterian. At that date I insisted that, "if anybody was to endure eternal torments, no doubt some infants would be among them." I was voted into the church over the assertion that "I could not, even for one moment, feel that God could be just in damning anybody eternally." I said: "I love you and all good men and women; but I see no justice in such doctrines." Many said: "These things have troubled us." I never said that I thought any infant would be damned; I waited in such matters. And I soon gave up the idea that any one could be forever miserable. The universe is bad enough as it is. Christians must stop making their God an Infinite Fiend, or they will only drive men into absolute atheism. The churches manufacture atheists by the thousand. And that is progress from their position.

STOP MY PAPER.—The publisher who sells himself for a few cents each week to his subscribers cannot get up a readable paper. A living evidence that it is read is that subscribers howl at it for not sustaining their individual ideas. No paper can represent every man's bias. It doesn't belong to the subscriber anyhow—that is, only so much as he pays for is his. Now if he should find a paragraph which doesn't suit his mind, let him write out his ideas, get it printed on a slip and paste it on his copy of the paper. He will have a better idea of what it costs to get up a paper, and also have one of his own.—Exchange.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers. Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES FOR 1875.

The Committee of the Free Religious Association, in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons, again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below,—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged:—

REASONS FOR USING THEEUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

Sent, postage prepaid, on receipt of price. Address THE INDEX, 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

THE FREE SUNDAY ADVOCATE.

A MONTHLY JOURNAL AND REVIEW DEVOTED TO THE INTEREST OF THE NATIONAL SUNDAY LEAGUE.

The objects of the League are to advocate the opening of all Museums, Art Galleries, &c., on Sundays; to maintain during the summer the running of cheap Sunday Excursions; to provide during the winter "Sunday Evenings for the People;" and generally to promote everything conducive to rational recreation on Sunday.

The Free Sunday Advocate is published in London, England, and is conducted by an Honorary Editorial Committee, consisting of the following: Mrs. J. H. Simpson, London; Thomas Marshall, London; Fredk Long, London; Francis W. Southern, London; Mark H. Judge, Hampstead.

The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION for delivery by post to any part of the United States is one dollar (payable in advance). Address

THE FREE SUNDAY ADVOCATE, 256 High Holborn, London, W.C., England.

RICHARDSON'S NEW METHODFor the Pianoforte.

It stands the test! Sells 25,000 yearly, and is gaining friends everywhere. No piano instruction-book ever issued approaches it for real merit and worth, and no teachers regret using it in their course of instruction. This work is a power in the musical advance of the day, and has been a most important agent in the recent tremendous increase of technical knowledge of the Pianoforte.

The success of RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD is world wide, and prompts many competitors; but its sale surpasses that of all others COMBINED, and it stands to-day incontestably superior to all other Piano Methods.

Used by thousands of Music Teachers, and sold by all Book and Music Dealers in this Country and Canada. PRICE $3.75.

All books sent, post-paid, for retail price.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———.

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

For List of Liberal Leagues, see next page.

GLIMPSES.

ARCHBISHOP PURCELL, of Cincinnati, recently forbade the people of his diocese to frequent public libraries or take books from them. That is the way in which Catholicism cherishes education.

THE New York Post Office authorities have ordered the delivery of letters by carriers in that city on Sunday. This is an important and needed reform, and should be extended throughout the country.

THE RADICAL CLUB held a good meeting at Mrs. Sargent's on Monday. Mr. Weiss read a brilliant essay; Messrs. Higginson, Whipple, Forsyth, Warren, Miss Peabody, Mrs. Howe, and others joined in the discussion.

THE MARQUIS OF BUTE, a Catholic nobleman under ecclesiastical advice, tried to prevent the formation of a Free Library in the town of Cardiff, Wales. He must be the original "Cardiff Giant," escaped from the Stone Age.

REV. C. D. BARROWS, of Lowell, preached a sermon recently in which he said: "There is an element of uncertainty connected with all our plans for the new year, but of the coming of a final year there can be no doubt. The Judgment is an absolute reality." Perhaps so; but the gentleman's judgment is an absolute myth.

It is credibly intimated by a private informant that the forthcoming report of the Massachusetts Commission on "Equal and Just Taxation" will not be unanimous; that the majority report of Messrs. Seelye and Barker will be in favor of continuing the exemption of religious, educational, and charitable institutions, while Mr. Hills will report against it. The reports will not be out, it is announced, for two or three weeks.

A BAPTIST blunderer says that "Rev. O. B. Frothingham, who towers like a giant among the free religionists, seems to have no idea of a God except such an one as man can make. 'An honest God's the noblest work of man'—is his secondhand perversion of Pope's excellent line." The originator of this "perversion" is Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, of Peoria, Illinois, whose "Oration on the Gods" is prefaced with it; and Mr. Frothingham is not given to stealing other men's brilliants. He has enough of his own.

A LITTLE GIRL of three years, belonging to "one of our respectable citizens," is reported by the Natick (Massachusetts) Bulletin to have been imprisoned a long time in a closet, where a mask was kept of which the poor little thing had a horrible dread, until her cries aroused the neighbors. Why? Because she could not remember to repeat correctly the Lord's Prayer, which her parents, with fiendish piety, required her to recite verbatim on pain of incarceration! If there was ever a worthy candidate for tar-and-feathers, it is this "respectable citizen."

IT IS stated on good authority that $575,000,000 have been invested in railroads in this country by capitalists who have as yet received no pecuniary return for the outlay; that $400,000,000 of this sum have been expended directly in paying wages to the laborers and other employes; and that the whole amount has thus been lent without interest to the working classes and the public, who have hitherto received the entire benefit of the investment. Such a fact as this ought not, in justice to capitalists, to be forgotten, when the relative value of the services of capital and labor to the community are under consideration.

REV. W. S. BELL, of New Bedford, who has just declared his independence of Christianity and boldly stepped outside of the pulpit, favored us with a call last week. He does not wish to be known as an ist of any sort, or to be labelled as the disciple of any ism. But he is prepared to lecture to any radical organization on the following subjects: "The Resurrection of Jesus," "The Relation of Science to Religion," "The Biography of Jesus," and "Christianity and Civilization." Without having had the pleasure of hearing him on the platform, we venture to say that he will be found a wide-awake, earnest, and attractive speaker; and we trust he will receive a hospitable hearing from the friends of THE INDEX everywhere.

ON May 1, 1874, according to the official figures of Messrs. Hills and Cushing, assessors to the city of Boston, there were in the twenty-two wards of the city 84,684 adult males above the age of twenty-one years; of this number about 78½ per cent., or 66,415, paid a poll-tax alone, and 21½ per cent., or 18,269, paid taxes on real or personal property, and 7,214 women, who pay no poll-tax, paid taxes on real and personal property to the amount of $83,121,400—the total valuation of the city being $798,755,050. In other words, 18,269 men and 7,214 women, in all 25,483, paid the entire property tax of the whole city of Boston! We do not know the exact population of the city last May; but, as it was somewhat over 350,000, it appears that the whole taxable wealth of Boston, so far as known to the assessors, was at that date in the hands of only about one fourteenth of the population. Such a fact as this is food for very grave thought.

IN REPLY to the unblushing denial of a "doctor and former professor of [Catholic] divinity" that Pope Gregory XIII. approved the massacre of Saint Bartholomew, Lord Acton quotes the original Latin of the Pope's bull, contained in a placard issued from the press of the Apostolic Chamber and distributed in Rome at the time. "When Gregory was informed," says Lord Acton (himself a Catholic), "that the Huguenots were being slain over the whole of France, he sent word to the King that this was better news than a hundred battles of Lepanto. The Pope proclaimed a jubilee, principally to thank God for this great mercy, and to pray that the King might have constancy to pursue to the end the pious work which he had begun. This bull has not, I think, been reprinted." The words of the bull are these: "Pro felici Christianissimi Regis contra hæreticos successu gratias agant, ipsumque orent ut quæ idem Rex auctore Domino facienda cognovit, ipso operante implere valeat."

THERE IS no reason to blame the swift jealousy for freedom which roused the whole North at the rumor of military interference by the United States Executive with a State Legislature. Constitutional limitations in times of peace must be respected, or constitutional liberty is at an end. It avails nothing to say that such interference was for the sake of peace, or order, or the rights of the colored people. No one could be more strenuous for these things than we are; but peace and order without liberty are worse than war. If war comes, let it be conducted openly on war principles. As to the colored people, they have every whit as profound an interest in constitutional government as the whites, and even more so, for the loss of it to them would soon be slavery. Least of all could they afford to have the whole nation, white and black together, subjected to military rule. Even if the recent astonishment, alarm, and indignation had been wholly groundless, they cannot be regretted by any one who remembers that popular liberty is not lost at a blow, but only gradually and insensibly. They are a sufficient reply to those who croak over the possibility of "Cæsarism" and "military despotism" in this country. That cannon, at least, is spiked. If a supposed usurpation of General Grant could raise such a storm, no other "Cæsar" could hold up his head for an instant.

Worship in the Nineteenth Century.

A DISCOURSE DELIVERED BEFORE THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY, NEW BEDFORD, OCT. 11, 1874.

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER.

After several months' exclusion from our church, while it has been undergoing transformation at the hands of architect and painter, we come back to resume our services in it to-day. We find it the same, and yet not the same; familiar and yet strange; old and yet new,—the old and the new, the familiar and the strange, variously commingling; commingling perhaps as yet to some eyes, that still linger fondly on recollections of the old, hardly harmoniously; and yet in such way as to mark quite truthfully the stage of transition through which this society as a progressive religious body, open willingly to the influences of the present age as well as to the power of old faiths, is passing. You do not discard the old because it is old; you do not break away from it by violence; yet you keep open doors and extend a hearty welcome to the new, in the faith that the old and the new are not aliens to each other, but children of one blood. Evolution—the modern scientific word,—Evolution of the new from the old has been the law of your progress as a religious society, from the date of your birth in the last century to the present hour. You have grown and acted in the spirit of Whittier's hymn,—

"That all of good the past has had Remains to make our own time glad," even though

... "the new transcends the old,
In signs and tokens manifold."

And it is because you have lived, and acted in this spirit, that this church-edifice, though little more than a generation has passed since it was first erected, and many occupants in these seats to-day were eager and interested witnesses of its building, stands here now, its solid outer walls the same, yet thus transformed within. You welcome the new religious thought of the time, you adapt your services and customs to it, more readily perhaps than any old religious society in the country. And yet you evidently believe in the Church as a distinctive institution of society; you believe in the utility of an edifice like this and in this Sunday service; you believe that the act of worship, though you may not much use the phrase, has some substantial and permanent foundation; for you have made this house more suggestive of the emotions of worship than it ever was before.

The occasion, therefore, seems naturally to suggest the inquiry, What is the significance of worship to people of progressive religious culture and thought in this nineteenth century? And this inquiry I make the topic of my discourse. The question, indeed, is not infrequently asked, whether, under the training of nineteenth-century thought, what is called worship is not gradually disappearing as a cast-off superstition. The question, in a somewhat sensational American style, has been put in this form: "Will the coming man attend church?" And not a few persons—persons, too, of intelligence and virtue—seem ready to answer this question in the negative. They see that the present man does not go to church so much as his fathers used to do. They see the newspaper, the magazine, the lyceum, the public library, to a considerable extent taking the place of the church and ministry in attracting and instructing the mind of the people. They see large numbers of cultivated persons—persons devoted to literature, to science, to philanthropy—who take apparently no interest in religious institutions, and rarely attend any religious service. They see the old theology of the churches of Christendom, which presented real food for thought in the past, gradually undermined by modern science, while in its place there is a growing tendency to sentimental preaching and ritualistic service, attractive chiefly to minds of emotional temperament or of inferior intelligence or wanting in masculine robustness of constitution. From these facts they argue that the Church is rapidly being outgrown, and will, before very long, for all except the ignorant and the superstitious, be an obsolete institution.

Such a deduction, in my view, is hasty and erroneous. Giving all credit to the persons who make it for sincerity of judgment and acuteness of observation, it yet does not seem to me to regard all the facts in the case, nor sufficiently consider the depth and stability of the religious sentiment. Further, those who make this deduction have, as a general rule, made a prior judgment against religion itself. The religious sentiment and everything known as religion in human history, rest, in their view, upon superstition; and if this were true, then of course every kind of expression of religion in worship must pass away as the superstition is dispelled by increasing knowledge. But this pre-judgment against religion is likely to bias their minds so as to prevent an adequate consideration of present religious facts and tendencies. For myself, striving to be free from all bias of prejudice on either side, and looking at all the facts concerning religion both historical and of our own time, I believe that some specific religious service is to be vindicated on grounds of man's mental constitution, and of the past experience of the human race, and of present utility.

But let me say at once, that I always hesitate at using the term worship to express what I mean by this specific religious service; and I dislike to use it at all without some explanation. The word has been used so much to denote some form of physical adoration, it has been connected so much with idolatry—and the idolatry is not all in religions called pagan,—it is a word so implicated historically with some visible image or symbol or external place of Deity and with some corresponding attitude of the human body, that it now almost inevitably suggests an outward and material rather than an inward and mental act. Perhaps we think when we hear it of such acts as the Mohammedan's prostration upon the earth at the name of Allah, or of the Parsees stretching their hands to the rising sun, or of the Fejee Islander embracing his idol, or of the Roman Catholic devotee manipulating his beads or falling upon his knees at the elevation of the host in the mass, or of the old Puritan, in his plain, unwarmed meeting-house and straight-backed pew, very literally "presenting his body a living sacrifice" to express his devotion,—or at least we think of the modern descendant of the Puritan, in his comfortably-cushioned pew and elegant church, going once a week through the outward, physical forms of devotion; and we are sure that in all such acts there must come in time, whatever may have been their origin, so much that is merely formal, external, official,—nay, that they come to cover so much insincerity, hypocrisy, moral corruption,—that the word which has been associated with them becomes to us, to some extent, "damaged phraseology," and we shrink from using it without explaining our meaning.

And yet the term worship is not necessarily and fatally implicated in the corruptions that have attended the practice of worship historically. In itself it is not even confined or conditioned by an outward act. One who at least in Christendom will be accepted as an authority is reported to have said that worship is not of time, nor place, nor body, but "in spirit and in truth." And this same grand distinction between the form and the substance of worship has been made by the greatest prophets and teachers of all the great religions. Not "burnt offerings" and "outward sacrifices" does God desire, said the Hebrew, but a "pure heart," a "right spirit," and "truth in the inmost parts." "Turn, if thou canst," said one of the later Hindu prophets, "to any spot where the house of God is not," and one of the earlier, "Any place where the mind of man can be undisturbed is suitable for the worship of the Supreme Being." "A man does not become a holy man," says Buddhism, "by his platted hair, by his family, or by both; in whom there is truth and righteousness, he is the true devotee." It may, I confidently think, be shown, too, that all acts and forms of worship, even those that seem to us to-day so superstitious and absurd, had their origin in some pure sentiment. They may have often drifted into formalism and hypocrisy, but they had a birth of which humanity need never be ashamed. Their source we may find in man's primitive sense of relation to some Power in the universe above and beyond himself, and able in some way to affect his destiny. Whether this Power was conceived as a unit or as multiform, or even if, as some later investigators think, the primitive phase of religion was the conception of the spirits of departed ancestors as still having relationship with and power over human beings on earth,—in any event the first forms of worship were intended as expressions of man's sense of relation to a form of life superior to himself, and mingling in some way with the natural forces of the material world, and having power over his earthly career. In a word, worship in its inner essence, whatever corruptions may have attended it historically, is an expression of man's sense of relation to a mysterious sovereignty in the universe beyond himself. With such explanation of its significance, there is certainly no occasion to discard the term.

As little occasion, with this understanding of its meaning, does there seem to me to be for discarding the act,—especially when we consider that all the greatest religious teachers have taken such pains to discriminate between the real inner meaning of the act and the corruptions into which it has fallen in its historical career. Indeed, with this significance, I do not see how it is possible that worship should ever be outgrown by the human mind. I can conceive how the forms of worship will change in the future as they have changed in the past; nay, I can conceive how the forms must change, in order to be true expressions, corresponding to the inevitable change which takes place in man's understanding of his relation to the sovereign Power in the universe, as he progresses in knowledge of the world and of himself. It is in this way, by reason of increased enlightenment, that forms of worship have changed in the past all the way from fetichistic idolatry to the pure mental devotion that is in spirit and in truth. But since I cannot understand how man can ever outgrow the sense of his relation to a mighty Power in the universe above and beyond himself, however variously he may come to interpret the relation, so I cannot imagine that a time will ever come when a feeling of this relation to the mysterious Life in which he is embodied will not at some hours so pervade and move his soul, that, even if he joins in no public adoration, he will yet alone in his closet, or wherever he may be, lift up his heart in secret aspiration for more of knowledge concerning the mighty Life to which he is thus related, for more of its energy in his own being, and for more of practical harmony with it. And such uplifting of the heart is of the essence of worship. Therefore, first, I should argue from the constitution of the human mind itself, that worship in its substance, though changing its forms and phases of expression, can never become obsolete.

And, secondly, I should reach the same conclusion from considering the historical experience of the human race. Worship is the expression, or an expression, of the religious sentiment. The worship has not created the sentiment, but the sentiment has created the worship. The worship, whatever form it has taken, has been the natural language of the sentiment. And so now or in the future, whatever form of utterance the religious sentiment may adopt as its natural language, that will be worship; if it adopt the same for a number of people, then common, or public, worship is the result. The question, then, at bottom is the permanence of the religious sentiment. And when I look back upon the history of the human race and see how vast a part the religious sentiment has played in human history, how active and constant and fertile it has been from the very rudest beginnings of man's career, how large a share it has had in his interests and how mightily it has affected his destiny, how it has built up some nations and destroyed others, pervaded the affairs of all; how it has inspired art, and created literatures, and shaped thought, and determined private conduct, and built up gigantic and peculiar institutions of its own, and moved great masses of men with a common enthusiasm and purpose,—when I look back upon all this and see what a power the religious sentiment has been, it does not seem to me at all probable that this power has all been a mistake, that it has all rested on a mere superstition, on a false conception of things, and that, under the increasing knowledge and culture of modern times, it is now near the end of its career. I see, indeed, that the religious sentiment has made mistakes, some of them grievous and great; I see that for want of knowledge it has allied itself often to superstition, and for want of humanity to bigotry. I see and admit the alleged evils and corruptions that have sprung from dogmatism, sectarianism, ecclesiasticism, idolatry,—they are, indeed, from my habit of thought, almost too constantly before my eyes; and yet, in spite of all, the religious faculty is to me the noblest endowment of the human mind,—the crown, so to speak, of the long struggle of the "Cosmical Life" to develop a finite being of reflective intelligence and volition. And this sentiment seems to me as ineradicable from human nature as it has been the constant accompaniment of human nature's historic career. The consciousness of relation to the power whence he has sprung once having been developed in man and making an integral part of his nature, it is indeed impossible to conceive of its being extinguished while man remains. Not by culture, scientific or other, is this sense of relationship to the inscrutable creative energy of the universe—call it, with Tyndall, "Cosmical Life" or call it "Deity"—to be lessened. Rather by every day's fresh intelligence will our sense of the mysterious relationship be deepened and broadened and brought more into accordance with facts, while from the very nature of the case something of the infinite mystery must forever remain concealed, enticing the mind upward to boundless search.

But let me add that, in saying that the religious sentiment is the natural and ineradicable root of worship and of all historical religions, I do not use the word sentiment as synonymous merely with feeling, or emotion. I do not believe that the religious sentiment would have been so powerful in history, if it had been only an emotion. But I use the word sentiment as involving both perception (or an intellectual act) and feeling; as including also the sense of moral obligation. I use it as denoting the entire disposition or tendency or faculty of the human mind which has resulted in religion. Historically, this disposition or tendency has always been of a complex nature. There has been the feeling of wonder, of awe, of reverence, or, it may be, of fear, aroused by some remarkable scene or occurrence; and, accompanying it, some mental judgment or conception concerning the phenomenon, referring it to a more than human power; and also an impulse to some line of conduct for effecting conformity with the power. Or the mental perception of human relation to some superhuman power may have come first, and often, I believe, did, and the emotion was subordinate to it. All that I wish now to say on the point is, that I use the term religious sentiment as including all these phases of mental action, and that historically all these elements have been present to make religion the great power it has been.

But though man's nature and history would seem to prove the permanence of the religious sentiment and of some form of worship as the expression of it, the question still remains whether the institution of a Sunday service like this is a kind of expression that best meets the demands of the cultivated religious sentiment of the present age. In other words, can we show the present utility of this service—utility in the fine sense of enlarging and feeding man's higher nature? The question of what may come in the future when the "coming man," with the garnered wisdom of all centuries added to his own inspiration, shall appear on this planet, we may dismiss as little concerning us who are on the planet to-day and responsible to some extent for its condition. Admitting that the religious sentiment is the creator of its forms of worship, and that with increasing light and culture it transforms old forms and creates new ones, we may have to admit our ignorance as to what kind of worship the future may bring, but may also safely leave the problem for the future to solve. But for the present, and so far as seems probable from man's present condition, for many a year and generation to come, I for one cannot doubt the utility of a specific organization for the promotion of religious culture and life, and of a specific religious service set apart in place and time like this.

Here we are, on this earth, immersed for the most part in material pursuits more or less gross, in buying and selling and getting gain, in taking care of our bodies or our estates, in the drudging toil of shop or farm or counting-room or household, in eating and drinking and providing the wherewithal to be clothed; and day after day this immersion goes on, absorbing our faculties, using up our energies, and draining off our vitality. And yet we all confess that there are parts of our natures—aspirations, desires, capacities for thought and action—that this daily routine of material pursuit, whether it be necessary or voluntary, does not satisfy. Now it is the office of the Sunday service to meet these higher demands of human nature; to feed these better aspirations, hopes, impulses of the human mind; to cultivate just that side of life which is admitted to be the nobler side, and which yet is left to so large extent uncultivated by the hard necessities or customs of daily toil amid lower interests. The Sunday service is intended to appeal to the moral and spiritual nature of man in distinction from the physical; to his rational nature as having the rightful supremacy over carnal appetite and passion. It aims, or should aim, to rouse the better motives, to quicken conscience, to stir generous impulses into activity, and to plant them where they are wanting; to awaken a stronger love and admiration for goodness, to open, purify, and cultivate the best affections of the heart. It seeks to make men more zealous for the truth and more heroic in the defence of it, less selfish and more self-sacrificing, more kind, more benevolent, better neighbors, better citizens. It finds men tempted, and it would fain bring strength to reinforce their efforts at resistance. It finds them fallen and vicious, and it strives to utter some word that shall renew their courage and help them to restoration. It finds them in despair, and it speaks and pleads for hope; in darkness, and it endeavors to show the dawning light. It finds them amid trials and under crushing burdens, and it strives to show how obstacles may be surmounted by the brave soul, and made into steps of ascent to power and virtue. It finds them sitting in the valley of the shadow of death, and it points them to the old hope of the Hereafter or to the new doctrine that death is but a phase in the eternal process of life.

Thus the Sunday service, for two or three hours one day in the seven, comes into our busy life as a quickener of moral effort and of spiritual aspiration, to the end of lifting the whole of our life to a higher level. In the midst of our material cares and callings, our moral struggles and failures, it holds before us the noble aim of Ideal Excellence. And even those of us who may not be so wholly engaged in material callings, but whose pursuits may be more mental and literary, or even philanthropic, may find it no small benefit to have the routine of our pursuits thus regularly interrupted, and our thoughts and feelings turned to other channels in a common religious service with our fellow-men. For the advantage comes in part from the social communion as well as from the uplifted individual aspiration. In a word, if the phrase spiritual nature of man, including his higher mental and moral nature as distinguished from the lower motives to which the ordinary pursuits and occupations and customs of life appeal, has any meaning, if there be any such higher part of our natures, any possible higher life than that with which our days are now most familiar, anything above these absorbing cares and tempting passions of the flesh, then the specific religious service, which appeals to these higher motives, and aims to strengthen and develop this higher life of man, is amply vindicated as having a right to be, and may be expected to survive so long as it shall answer such high ends.

And as helps to this aim let us have all the accessories that are within our reach from art and culture. Worship may be very real, and attain for some hearts its ends, in a meeting-house of Quaker plainness, and under conditions of whatever extemporaneous speech may chance to arise from the congregation, or of silence, which is often better than speech. But there is danger of spiritual inertness under such conditions. Most of us are in need of such appliances as appeal to the eye and the ear and to the cultivated reason, to stir our spiritual thought and emotions to activity. Music often touches with uplifting power places in the heart where the word of the preacher fails to penetrate. Forms of beauty in architecture and color lend also their gracious influence in awakening the emotions of reverence and aspiration. By-and-by, perhaps, these dull and lifeless windows, which you have not changed, will give place to richness of color,—not that we may bring back the "dim religious light" of mediæval times, but that we may have the perfect harmony and beauty of light which Nature and art, Nature's disciple, can produce. I have a hope that at some time our Protestant churches, having achieved all that the rude iconoclasm of the Reformation was commissioned to perform, will bring back fitting pictures and statues to their walls; or at least that the coming religion, wherever it assembles the people, will not forget art as one of its noble instruments.

But all such accessories appeal chiefly to the religious emotions, and a church cannot live on emotions. There must be living thought in the pews and the living word in the pulpit; thought and word abreast with the times, and palpitating with the spirit of divine Life that is freshly flowing in the world to-day. I have already said that, in the history of religion, emotion and mental perception, feeling and thought have been the constant factors in all healthy, normal, and powerful religious development. And so it must be to-day, if religion is to preserve its ancient prestige and power. And this is a point on which I should take decided issue with a portion of Professor Tyndall's late address, if I rightly understand it. He speaks of giving up to religion the region of the emotions, while he would have it abandon the province of thought on the great problems of existence; and thus he apparently encourages the notion, popular among certain classes of theologians, that religion and science are of incompatible temperament and must be divorced; though at the very close of the address there are some words of a different tenor, and, as a whole, it seems to me most admirable. But against the statement above alluded to, in the name of religion itself considered in its nature and its history, and in behalf of the dignity of my office as a religious teacher, I would enter a protest. I would make the protest, too, in behalf of the present and future interests of religion and of mankind. The weakness of religion to-day, the very reason why it is losing its hold upon so many thoughtful and cultivated people, and people that, though not much cultured, are full of the thought of the age that is in the air, is because this very divorce has to a considerable extent taken place, and religion is already too much given up to feeding the emotions. A religion that is wholly absorbed in the region of the emotions cannot, I believe, long survive among an enlightened people. Emotion has its proper office, and it is a very important one; but it is thought that guides the emotions, and in the long run safely moves the world. A religion without thought is emasculated, and must dwindle to decay. And if under the emotional influences of this place, if amid these surroundings of art and beauty and elegant comfort, this society and its minister should ever become enervated in thought, and forget their obligations to ideas, and sink into mental stagnation, then I pray that some old iconoclast may rise from the grave, some Luther, or George Fox, or George Whitefield, and raise the trumpet-voice of reform, and sweep from these walls all their beauty, and silence the music, and leave the congregation in a plain meeting-house, or drive it into a hall or a barn or into the open air, where it may hear with undistracted mental ear the living voice of truth. Far better unadorned and desolate walls with living and earnest thought within, than all possible elegance and beauty of an emotional religion with mental death.

And if the Sunday service of religion, while it kindles the emotions of the spiritual nature, must at the same time aim to awaken thought and to keep pace with its progress, much more must it serve to sustain and to strengthen the natural principles of morality. This, the final point, is also in its practical aspects the chief point. Matthew Arnold has defined religion as "morality suffused with emotion." Philosophically, this may hardly pass as a complete definition. But practically the definition is excellent, because it lays the emphasis where in the common affairs of life it most needs to be laid. Taking mankind in general, the emotional nature in religion does not need so much to be aroused as it needs to be guided by a wise knowledge and a true moral culture. And one sees sometimes such lamentable illustrations of an intense emotional piety combined with a feeble moral sense and even with positive immorality, that one is tempted to exclaim, "Emotion is nothing—morality is everything!" And certainly, if religious emotion does not issue in good works, it proves itself of little worth; and to many souls it doubtless operates as a delusion and a snare. They mistake an inflated currency of feeling for the solid coin of virtue. The emphasis, then, must be placed on moral conduct, and all religious feeling brought to that clear test. We may say of emotion that it is desirable, but of morality that it is a necessity. Given two persons, one of whom shall be emotionally religious even to a high degree, fluent in prayer-meeting, zealous for his church, ready at any time to speak of his conscious relation to God, but weak in morals; and the other shall be simply upright, vigorously honest, pure, generous, merely a moral man, as the saying is, but shall have never known what it is to be thrilled with a sense of the Divine Presence,—and I am sure that the latter will go into heaven before the former. I would rather anywhere take the chances of the merely moral man than of the merely pious man. The merely pious man, by his aspiration, his feeling, his sentiment, is reaching upward through the air to get his hold on God. The moral man, though he may be utterly unable to say what the phrase "presence of God" means, and has no consciousness of it, yet actually dwells nearer to it: for that line of strict integrity which marks his daily conduct is the identical pathway where the Divine Presence walks.

And at this day, so rife in public and private corruption, when we hear and see so much of self-seeking intrigue in politics, of dishonesty in trade, of embezzlement and swindling in financial institutions, of mercenariness in public men, of loose license in domestic relations, of portentous evils menacing the sacredness of marriage and the stability of the family, surely the Church has a special call, as it has in the Sunday service a grand opportunity, to proclaim, with all the emphasis at its command, the primal obligation and sanctity of the moral law. Whatever it may do or neglect to do for the culture of the religious emotions, it has a solemn duty in upholding public and private morality, which it cannot evade without peril to itself and society. Whatever be the means, this must be the end. Whatever else may come into religion to give it grace and symmetry, this must come as its abiding substance. For the old prophet-voiced words have lost none of their truth, and need to be uttered to-day with fresh energy: "Who shall ABIDE in thy tabernacle? Who shall DWELL in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that slandereth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbor. He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not. He that doeth these things shall never be moved."

GLADSTONE AND BISMARCK.

FREDERIC HARRISON ON THE CRUSADE AGAINST CHARACTER.

The following letter has been addressed to us, through our London office, by Mr. Frederic Harrison. It was said by a London wit, long ago, when the English disciples of Comte first began to be talked about, that the Positive Church in England consisted of "three persons and no God," the three persons being Dr. Congreve, Frederic Harrison, and Professor Beesley. The influence upon English thought which these three gentlemen have exerted can scarcely be measured, but that it has been great is undeniable. Of the three Mr. Harrison is perhaps the most forcible writer. His contributions to the Contemporary Review, the Fortnightly Review, and the Pall Mall Gazette, to say nothing of his other productions, have attracted the attention of thinking people in two hemispheres; and we are inclined to believe that the letter which he has addressed to us will be read with the keenest interest, not only by those who agree with but by those also who will dissent from his conclusions.—Ed. New York World.

7 NEW SQUARE, LINCOLN'S INN, }
November 3, 1874.

Sir,—I cannot inform you of any express opinion on the part of the Positivist body upon Mr. Gladstone's pamphlet and the Vatican decrees, but I will tell you what is my own view of the matter.

The hubbub caused by the pamphlet seems to me curiously forced and ill-timed, and serves to show how much politicians are in want of something to talk about. The Syllabus, the double allegiance, and the Vatican decrees are matters of history. The world had its say about them when they were first started, and nothing whatever has occurred to give them any fresh bearing or importance. The revival of a subject which is purely one of technical theology is at the present time a piece of mere mischief. The Vatican decrees matter nothing whatever to the politician as such; and they matter to him now even less than ever. Prince Bismarck thought they might be used to draw off the attention of Germans from the military tyranny in which they are held; and Mr. Gladstone seems to think they can put a little life into a very dull time. But in truth the Pope's infallibility is a matter entirely between the Pope and his own people; and if statesmen, Protestants, or free-thinkers meddle in it, it can only be for the sake of a wrangle. There have been ages, even in England, when the political pretensions and teachings of the Catholic Church were matters of life and death to English statesmen; but as that Church has now no kind of danger for this nation, to entangle an inoffensive body of religionists in the hypotheses of their abstract dogmas is a bit of mere stone-throwing.

The Catholic priesthood in England is one of the most industrious, respectable, and peaceable in the world, and the very little political power it wields has long been exerted to national and liberal ends. In Ireland the priesthood has far greater power; but it has been using it to check, not to fan, the insurrectionary movement. It is, therefore, most wanton for English politicians to worry a Church like this about mere casuistical difficulties in its theology, and all the theologies are full of such difficulties. This may be sensational literature, but it is not statesmanship.

It is easy to force Catholics, or any other theologians, into logical dilemmas; but as a matter of fact we all know that a more loyal, conservative, and national body of men does not exist in this island. They cause no government trouble, and neither embarrass Church nor State. Mr. Gladstone, Lord Acton, and Dr. Dollinger appear to have put their heads together to start an Old-Catholic movement in England as a pendant to the ridiculous Neo-Christian bubble in the Anglican Church. Even in Germany, where Old Catholicism is supported by the whole force of the government (which takes it up just as Napoleon III. used to subvention an inspired newspaper), it is a miserable abortion. Here it will be welcomed only by half a dozen archaeologists, and die out like "Lady Huntingdon's Connection."

As to the deeper principles involved in this discussion, it certainly seems to me that those who attack the Church are asking of it admissions which they never would make themselves. If they would, they are teaching doctrines more dangerous to liberty and morality than any attributed to the Popes. They demand of the Catholic Church that it shall pledge itself never to make a matter of religious duty anything which the State forbids; that it shall disclaim any right to counsel resistance to the civil arm in any extremity. And they go on to charge obedient Catholics with being potentially bad citizens, because we can devise hypothetical cases where the Church might bid Catholics to defy the State. I trust that not only every Church, but every community of freemen who are joined together to increase their knowledge or strengthen their energies, would ever resist any such slavish doctrine. The very object of a church, of a religious congregation, nay, of any social brotherhood whatever, is to hold up before its members standards of duty which are not those current in practical life—not those enforced by magistrates or policemen. To tell a church that it is never to meddle with politics, never to teach a duty different from that approved by the government of the day, is to tell it that it is not to be a religious community at all, but a government bureau on a par with the official gazette. There is no religious community, no moral or intellectual association, which would honestly accept these terms. And it would be easy to push any religionist into similar logical dilemmas by using hypothetical cases. Quakers object to war, therefore the Society of Friends will turn traitors to an enemy; therefore Mr. Bright is unworthy of political trust. The Cobden Club swear by the doctrines of Mr. Cobden. One of these doctrines was to surrender the colonies. Therefore the Cobden Club might one day be found plotting the dismemberment of the empire. Exeter Hall denounced the opium war. Some of our civil and military officers are under the inspiration of Exeter Hall. Therefore we may expect them to desert to the enemy in a possible war with China. These exercises of irritating logic are as easy as they are puerile. If every opinion a man holds is to be followed out to what we think its logical result, and every man is to be supposed in any dilemma which our ingenuity can frame, every man is a rebel. If Mr. Disraeli and the Archbishop of Canterbury succeeded in passing an act to burn every copy of the Bible, Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Whalley would be preaching sedition and heading a rebellion. If they passed an act abolishing from Anglican churches vestments, crosses, fonts, and organs, rubrics, prayer-book, and hymn-book, Mr. Gladstone would be raging about the country as the Hugh Paters of a new rebellion. No religious body whatever, no association of citizens, ever would, or ever ought, to bind itself beforehand to passive obedience; and it is a mere bit of clap-trap to call upon the Catholics of England to surrender in terms a right which perhaps they would be the last people in this country to exercise in deeds.

As to the pretext that the new doctrine of Infallibility has made Catholics more dangerous citizens than their neighbors, it is a piece of idle logic. I do not pretend to understand what the Orthodox Catholic doctrine is, and I doubt if Catholics understand it themselves. It is a bit of mysticism, not more absurd than, and as harmless as, the Trinity or the Paraclete. If it gives Catholics any comfort, they have as much right to it as Anglicans have to their baptismal regeneration or apostolical succession; and it concerns politicians and the State just as little as the Protestant fads. In public we do not find that Catholics are under more restraint or are less likely to be good citizens and reasonable men than the members of other communities, sects, parties, and cliques. I should say that average Catholics exercise their minds at least as freely and behave as conscientiously as the followers of Mr. Spurgeon or Dr. Pusey. An academic or literary clique is just as much pledged to obey orders, and I should suppose that the writers of a powerful newspaper (say the Times) have surrendered their judgment quite as completely as a Catholic layman, and implicitly obey a still more infallible Pope. Practical statesmen ought to look at practical results, and need not split hairs over the dilemmas which a religious community weave for themselves in their efforts to stand against the progress of science.

Every word of this controversy illustrates the soundness of the Positive theory of temporal and spiritual (i. e. moral and intellectual) power. The Church of Rome has brought much of the difficulties on itself by its outrageous pretensions (in time past) to temporal power, enormous wealth, and usurpation of civil functions and offices, all which things are out of the sphere of any moral authority. But since in our day no practical evil of the kind either exists or need be apprehended, the attempt to fasten on the Church the consequences of its old errors is of sinister meaning in Germany as in England. In both we see a tendency in the State and its literary partisans to usurp the place of an independent moral authority, to crush out free criticism, to get the control of education, to set up State religions, to make pulpits and journals alike its creatures, and to demand of all moral associations a mere passive obedience. The claim of the State to be supreme is just as tyrannical and preposterous as the old claim of the Church to be supreme. In Germany we have a Chancellor-Pope making demands more arrogant than any Boniface, and just as fatal to real progress and true morality. The hubbub about the Vatican decrees is a silly mimicry of this flagrant aggression of the military bureaucracy of Prussia. Though no man can have less sympathy than I have with the historical pretensions of the Vatican, or can more heartily detest the intellectual and political views of Catholicism in Europe, I cannot but regard the Catholic side in this controversy as being in its broad features the side of liberty and moral independence.

Yours, etc.,
FREDERIC HARRISON,
To Manton Marble, Esq., Editor of The World, New York.

THE DOVER CHURCH CASE.

HALE VERSUS EVERETT.

We are indebted to the courtesy of John M. Shirley, Esq., the official reporter, for advance sheets of the forthcoming volume of Reports of Decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire, containing, besides the interesting case of Eastman versus Clark, illustrative of the question how far the sharing of profit tends to establish the relation of co-partnership, the case decided in December, 1868, and quite generally known as "the Unitarian Church case," the technical name of which heads this notice.

In the latter case, the complainants were in their bill in equity averred to be members of "The First Unitarian Society of Christians in Dover," and their complaint was in substance that the wardens and the majority of the parish were employing as preacher for the society a pure theist, who openly disavowed his belief in Christianity; and they prayed that the wardens might be enjoined not to permit such use of their pulpit for the future.

The preacher so employed was Mr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot, a young gentleman admitted on all hands to be in every way of the most admirable character and of distinguished ability. He had been regularly settled in 1864, very soon after the completion of his theological education, as the minister of the parish, and acted as such till the early part of the year 1868, when he found that such a change had taken place in his opinions that he could no longer, in his judgment, call himself a Christian; and he, consequently, so stated to his parish and resigned his charge. The majority of the society, however, wished to enjoy his ministrations, and made arrangements with him to that end. A new organization was formed, which made these arrangements. Whether such new organization was or was not formed, and whether by its formation its members ceased to be members of the parish, were questions in the case, which were more or less discussed, but, as we cannot but think, rather loosely; for the establishment of the affirmative of the propositions should have been fatal to the plaintiffs, who averred and maintained it.

The court (p. 106) use the following language in their opinion: "Having found, as matter of fact in this case, that these defendants had, on or before the ninth day of June, 1868, not only, as they supposed, formed a new and independent society for the promotion of free religious principles, but had abandoned and intentionally seceded from the First Unitarian Society of Christians in Dover, it follows that they forfeited all right to that society's property or any part thereof, or to the use of any property which belonged or the use of which belonged to the old society, and hence have no further claim to the use of the meeting-house in question for any purpose whatever. Hence it follows that the injunction asked for in this case should be granted, as well upon the facts of the case as upon the law."

(The ninth of June, 1868, was prior to the filing of the bill of complaint.)

It would seem to be difficult to decide a case otherwise than upon the facts as well as the law; and we venture to think that the court intend to say that the facts are so clear and simple that there can be no question how the law should apply to them. And so Mr. Justice Doe appears to think; for he says, in his dissentient opinion (p. 237), "If the defendants were seceders from the corporation, and not members of it, the bill should be dismissed, because it can be maintained only on the ground that they are members of the corporation, controlling it or its property in an unlawful manner. If they were not members, they would be mere trespassers, and an action at law would lie, or the police could be called in to protect the house against invasion; there would be nothing in the case to give us chancery jurisdiction. When there is a plain and adequate remedy at law, and the plaintiff's right has not been established at law, a bill for an injunction does not lie to prevent a simple trespass." All which seems obvious and conclusive. The court have found the facts, and the dissentient justice applies the law to them in a manner which, in our poor judgment, leaves nothing to be said, except that the bill must be dismissed.

The court (p. 107) had read the first draft of the dissenting opinion before concluding its own opinion; but, while it devotes some twenty-five pages to various historical and theological matters, it does not allude to the brief and pointed sentence which one would think made an end of the case. It may be that it was not contained in the first draft; but it would be very odd that such a point should have occurred to one judge, and not have been brought to the notice of his brethren, unless we conclude that in the ardent pursuit of grand questions, a small though decisive one has escaped attention.

Perhaps theological polemics are too fascinating to the human mind to permit its working well and soundly while under their influence. At any rate, the court (Mr. Justice Sargent) on the one hand, and Mr. Justice Doe on the other, revel at very great length in law, history, and theology, so that the case will be a very mine of learning to the student and the practising lawyer. But the opinions, each of course very able, and the latter particularly pungent and witty, are too nearly balanced in point of weight to permit the case to become one of controlling authority.

The result was, that an injunction was granted forbidding the defendants to permit any doctrines to be preached in the church "subversive of the fundamental principles of Christianity as generally received and held by the denomination of Christians known as Unitarians."

The decision rests mainly on the ground that the name of the society and its practice since its formation in 1827 indicated that its property was held in trust for the promotion of the said fundamental principles.

But certain provisions of the constitution and statutes of New Hampshire are carefully considered in both the opinions.

Mr. Abbot resigned his pastoral charge before the decision was given. He was perfectly frank in all his conduct, and his course commanded and received the respectful regard of the court. Mr. Justice Doe maintained that, though Mr. Abbot himself denied that he was a Unitarian or a Christian, yet, upon the authority of such men as the extremely conservative Dr. Peabody and of the whole Unitarian denomination, he was in fact both. His remarks upon this and several other points will be found extremely diverting. The case occupies two hundred and sixty-six pages of the volume.—American Law Review for January, 1875.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN ENGLAND.

OBJECTIONS TO WOMAN SUFFRAGE. By Captain Maxse, R.N. London: T. Brettell & Co.

Anything which comes from Captain Maxse merits courteous attention, and it is with regret that we find ourselves opposing so true and bold a radical. Our regret is deepened by the fact that Captain Maxse goes a long way with us, so that our hopes are raised only to be dashed to the ground. He does not reproduce the stereotyped arguments against an extension of the franchise to women; not his selfishness which would dwarf woman in order to make her more serviceable to man, nor the disparaging tone towards woman's powers, nor the sneer at her aspirations for increased work and increased responsibilities. The following passage is sufficient to show that Captain Maxse's objections to woman suffrage do not proceed from narrow-minded prejudice: "I need hardly say I have no prejudice against women who think for themselves, and who are therefore strong-minded. I welcome the presence of mental strength in women, all the more because it is so rare; and so far am I from sharing popular objections to woman suffrage that, while I would not give women the vote, I would most willingly remove their disability to sit in Parliament, and assuredly remove all disabilities which now prevent their serving in many professions and trades, holding that Nature may be very well left to mark the limits of their work." These fine words prove Captain Maxse's superiority to the general defenders of the restriction of the suffrage to men. His own objections are the fear that women will be, as a rule, conservative, and opposed to enlightenment and progress, and a dislike to giving further representation to the propertied classes. He argues, to begin with, that women have not naturally the power of governing men, because "natural government rests on force." But here Captain Maxse overlooks two facts, which cut the ground from under the feet of this argument. First, no one wants to give women "the power of governing men," but women ask to be admitted to a share of the governing power; they ask that men and women shall together choose those who are to govern men and women; not that one class shall rule the other, but that all citizens shall be fairly represented. Secondly, is Captain Maxse prepared to approve of governments resting on force? A liberal government is based on justice; only tyrannies are based on force. The rule of the strongest physique is a sign of barbarism; it is the natural government, but civilization is one long struggle against Nature, one sustained endeavor to improve on Nature's rough and unmoral condition; women are physically weaker-framed than men, although experience shows that this difference depends much on the relative habits of the two sexes; this physical inferiority of strength is, however, no argument against women being citizens, unless it is seriously maintained that strong men have a natural right to usurp the government, and to deprive weak men of any share in it, because "natural government rests on force."

There is truth in Captain Maxse's idea, that the majority of higher-class women are opposed to radicalism, although we think he much exaggerates the effect of their vote. To begin with, women will not vote as a class; they will be influenced by the thousand influences to which men are subjected. Working-class women are not more conservative than working-class men; in the higher-class a gentle form of Whiggery would probably divide the vote with conservatives, just as the higher-class men are just now divided. Lady Amberley was not a rarer case of a "noble" radical than is her husband. But we entirely demur to Captain Maxse's notion that—were every woman in the country a high Tory—this would be any reason for denying them a vote. If the majority in a country is conservative, the country should be ruled by a conservative government. Ultra-radical as I am personally, and just because I am a radical, I acknowledge that a conservative majority has a right to the government. What kind of liberalism is that which only demands the liberty to impose its own ideas on its neighbors? Radicalism defends the right of all equally, and does not allow oppression, because, in any given case, oppression happens to assist its own cause.

Captain Maxse's objection that the extension of the franchise to women would increase only the representation of the propertied class would, we think, disappear if he would regard the question for a moment from our point of view. In pleading for the equal rights of women we are not agitating for a reform of the suffrage qualification; however earnestly we may desire this, this has nothing to do with the woman suffrage question. The point at which we aim is simply that men and women should have equal power, be that power great or little. Where rich men have votes, we would give them to rich women; where working-men have votes, we would give them to working-women; all we ask is, that sex should cease to be either a qualification or a disqualification. Before the law we claim that men and women should be on an equality. We work none the less earnestly for the extension of the suffrage, because we would abolish the sex qualification; we labor not the less for manhood suffrage, because we would make it include womanhood as well.

We do not despair of yet seeing Captain Maxse fighting on our side. He is too honest, too fair-minded, to remain long on the side of injustice. In conclusion, we beg his pardon very heartily if we have said anything to offend him; but loyalty to principle comes before loyalty to a faithful servant of "the cause." But the "Ajax" who heard read at Northampton, last September, Captain Maxse's gallant letter, would very much have preferred reviewing some essay of his which could have been met with unreserved admiration.—"Ajax," in London National Reformer of Dec. 6.

GERRIT SMITH.

Mr. Gerrit Smith, widely known as a philanthropist and a leader in anti-slavery and temperance reforms, died in New York at noon yesterday. Last Thursday evening he went to that city to spend the Christmas with his niece, and seemed to be and remarked to his relatives that he was in exceptionally good health and spirits up to Friday night. On Saturday morning it was found that his mind was wandering, and he suddenly lost consciousness. The attack under which he gradually sank was pronounced by Dr. Bayard, the attending physician, to be of an apoplectic character. He remained at a late hour on Sunday night in a comatose condition, having been conscious only for ten or fifteen minutes since the attack. Mr. Smith was born in Utica, N. Y., in 1797, and was graduated at Hamilton College in 1818. In 1833, he was admitted to practice in the State and federal courts of New York, though never a student at law, and participated in several important trials. At an early age he began to take an active part in the benevolent enterprises of the day, and in 1825 he connected himself with the American Colonization Society, from the hope that the success of its projects would lead to speedy emancipation. He gave largely for the accomplishment of its objects, but in 1835 he withdrew from it and connected himself with the American Anti-Slavery Society. Though by inheritance and purchase from his fellow-heirs he was one of the largest land-owners in the United States, he nevertheless became strongly opposed to land monopoly, and practically illustrated his sentiments by distributing two hundred thousand acres, partly among institutions of learning, but mostly among the poor white and black men, in parcels averaging nearly fifty acres. His largest gifts of money were in aid of emancipation and to enable the poor to buy homes. In 1852, Mr. Smith was elected to Congress from one of the New York districts, but at the close of the first or long session he resigned, on account of the pressure of his private affairs, and also on account of his disrelish for public life. For many years he advocated, both by public speeches and by published essays and appeals, a larger liberty of opinion and freedom from what he believed to be the bondage of sect. In 1861, Mr. Smith made a few speeches in behalf of a vigorous and uncompromising prosecution of the war in which the country was involved, and also wrote many articles to this end for the press. But few of his speeches and addresses have been collected in permanent form, the only two volumes worthy of note being his speeches in Congress and Sermons and Speeches, by Gerrit Smith.

A late dispatch from New York says that the body of Gerrit Smith lies at the residence of General Cochrane, and will be conveyed to Peterborough to-day or to-morrow for interment, and gives the following additional particulars of his death: Just previous to Mr. Smith's death, he partly revived from his comatose state. His wife took his hand and asked him, if he recognized her, to press it. A feeble effort to comply was made by the dying man, barely sufficient to assure his wife of her recognition. When it was positively ascertained that Mr. Smith could not survive much longer, his old friend Thurlow Weed was sent for; but before he had time to reach his bedside the great philanthropist breathed his last.

The New York Tribune eulogizes his life-work by saying that his charities, scattered through half a century, have become almost as familiar to men's thoughts as the heavenly gifts of rain and sunshine. Wherever the cry of distress has gone forth, his ear has been one of the first to hear it, and his hand one of the first to succor. He has not been merely a giver. He has been a speaker and writer also, always fearless and honest, always doing his best for the cause he regarded as just. He has never written a word which was not prompted by a love of liberty, and a wish to broaden and make easy the road by which men could go forward to higher and better destinies. His means and measures were not always so faultless as his aspirations. But none were ever dictated by anything less than a conscientious desire to serve God in freedom and help his fellow-men. There have been few men in our history who have conquered a greater degree of personal respect. People were accustomed to say that there was something "princely" about him, though in fact there are few princes who could vie with him in the qualities indicated by the phrase. He had the easy and assured manners of one born to a position of power and responsibility, a tall and commanding person, and that sincere and direct address of men of profound convictions and high courage. In Washington he was treated with equal respect by friends and enemies. At a time when the name of abolitionist was detested and condemned with an intensity which it is now difficult to understand, Mr. Smith was universally popular in Congress. His stately courtesy, his stature, and his wealth, all doubtless had their effect upon the Southern politicians, but it would be doing them injustice to deny that they also appreciated his innate nobility and manliness of character. For what he did he will be remembered long and affectionately. But his fame will be securely founded upon what he was.—Boston Advertiser, Dec. 29.

Captain E. B. Ward, of Detroit, whose sudden death is said to have produced a sensation in his city second only to that occasioned by the death of President Lincoln, was one of the most remarkable men that we have ever known. A poor boy, with a slender school training, he acquired a great deal of important information, and made his way to the foremost place in the ranks of the business men of the Northwest. He had built and used a score of large steamers, besides many vessels of smaller size, owned vast rolling-mills, saw-mills, and many thousands of acres of valuable pine-lands, with iron-mines, silver-mines, etc. He was president of two railroads. His great wealth is estimated by millions, although it is likely to suffer from the absence of his personal oversight. In courage, independence, and prodigious force of will and intellect he has been seldom equalled. With extreme self-reliance, he thought for himself upon all subjects, being almost entirely indifferent to public opinion and the voices of "authority." During the war, Captain Ward was ardently patriotic, and if Andrew Johnson had been impeached there is little doubt that Mr. Wade would have appointed him Secretary of the Treasury. He was a very liberal friend of the Detroit Unitarian church, and was also a prominent "Spiritualist." He subscribed $2000 towards the "Index Fund," and was one of the Vice-Presidents of the Free Religious Association. From some of his theoretical and practical views of human life and duty we were obliged to dissent, most emphatically; but while we could not approve of all he said or did, we have been attached to him by the grateful memory of personal kindness, and the knowledge of many acts of unostentatious generosity which he performed. While not indifferent to his own interests, he was also public-spirited, and surpassed all other men in developing the resources of the region in which he lived. He provided amply for his unfortunate kindred, and was one of the most loyal and constant of friends, as well as a devoted brother and a dutiful son. He distributed freely thousands of books, sometimes of little value, but usually as good volumes as were ever published, including writings of Channing and Beecher. Never shrinking from conflict, and when engaged in it disinclined to ask or give much quarter, there was a gentle and tender side to his nature, known to very few, perhaps, yet often revealed to us in the time of our intimacy, about twenty years ago. His sister, best known as "Aunt Emily," because of the many orphans to whom she has been almost a mother, and the scores of young men and women whom she has befriended, is one of the noblest women that have ever blessed the world. Without wearing the garb, she has done the work, of a Sister of Charity. Her brother's fondness for her, and his readiness to assist her in numerous and costly works of mercy, was one of the finest traits of his character. In her great bereavement she has our heartfelt sympathy.—Christian Register, Jan. 9.

THE SECOND RADICAL CLUB held a meeting at their rooms in Tremont Place, last evening. The subject under consideration was compulsory education. Mr. F. E. Abbot, of THE INDEX, read an able essay on the subject, favoring the enforcement on the young of our common school educational system. The essayist principally dwelt upon the political aspect of the question, and stated that the illiterate people of New England numbered about 7 per cent. of the entire population, and from that class came 87 per cent. of the criminals. Some sharp discussion followed the reading, and both sides of the question were ably presented. A gentleman of the Roman Catholic faith endeavored to show that the position of Mr. Abbot was untenable; but this he failed to do, in our judgment. Herbert Spencer was quoted against the position taken by the essayist, but, as we believe, with only a narrow understanding of Mr. Spencer's views. Mr. Forsyth, a gentleman from England, in a very entertaining and logical manner, gave the result of his observations as in every way favorable to compulsory education. There was no one who disputed the desirableness of general education among the masses of people. But as to the wisdom of forcing it on the public there was considerable doubt.—Boston Daily News, Dec. 29.

A ZEALOUS but ignorant negro preacher, in expounding to his flock as to the astounding nature of miracles, got a little confused in the matter. He said: "My beloved friends: the greatest of all miracles was 'bout the loaves and fishes. Dere was five thousand loaves and two thousand fishes, and de twelve 'postles had to eat dem all, and de miracle is dey didn't bust."

GERRIT SMITH.

BY M. L. HAWLEY.

A man, and not an empty name,
Upon whose kindly face was writ,
In living characters and fit,
A lesson that would put to shame
All meaner lives; a presence rare
And gracious, such as once was found,
Or fabled, at the Table Round
Of Arthur's Court, when gathered there
That noble company of knights
Whose aim, like his, was quick redress
To wrongs of weakness and distress;
To wrench from power man's stolen rights.

A braver soul 'twere hard to find
In all the annals of the past;
A sweeter life from first to last
Was never lived among mankind.

If Charity is over all,
And greater, then this man must stand
Unmatched in this or any land
For heeding its diviner call.

For bounded by no time, nor place,
Nor circumstance, nor life, nor creed,
Nor color, but by human need,
He poured its blessings on the race.

If like a prince to him was given,
More princely still he used the gift;
With what a matchless power to lift
All burdens he has grandly striven!

Lord of broad acres, which had made
Some baron of the olden time
A tyrant steeped in every crime,—
He used them but the poor to aid.

For with the strength of his great soul
He loathed monopoly and caste,
And held that his possessions vast
By right were theirs, and not by dote.

A noble man of giant frame,
Whose mind was mated with its house,
And both magnificent to rouse
A nation slumbering in its shame.

A conscience keen that slumbered not,
Nor suffered others—tongue and pen
At service of his fellow-men
With eloquence of truth begot.

An open house, a generous board,
Where rich, and poor, and bond, and free,
Had each an equal right to be—
If any, there the slave was lord.

And pilgrims in the future years
Shall come where lived this uncrowned king
Among his neighbors, and shall bring Their grateful offerings of tears.

No homily is needed here;
This life outruns the written creeds,
And speaks through all its generous deeds
Of love that casteth out all fear.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or single numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on Boston or New York. Checks on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

The Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 21, 1875.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 1, TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

SUNDAY LECTURES.—The Editors of THE INDEX will lecture occasionally on Sundays, if desired, within a convenient distance of Boston.

THE Christian Statesman disowns the words of President Cummings at the late Christian Amendment convention in this city, as reported in the Advertiser and Journal and quoted in THE INDEX of December 24. It presents instead a very ambiguous and (we must say) a very adroit passage from the speaker's manuscript, as published in the Globe—which we did not see. As Dr. Cummings used no manuscript, but spoke without notes, this quotation is no evidence of what he said. The exact words he used may not be preserved by the reports we cited; but they were far stronger than those now authorized, and were not essentially misrepresented by those now repudiated, as we can personally testify. His bigoted utterances, however, not being defended, may be dismissed from further notice.

ANOTHER edition (the seventh) of Professor Tyndall's famous address at Belfast has been issued in a pamphlet of one hundred and twenty pages, of which thirty-one are devoted to a new preface. In this he denies the recantation attributed to him, justifies his "prolonging the intellectual vision across the boundary of experience," reaffirms his original position taken at Belfast, and answers some of his critics,—always with that delicacy of thought and expression which is his charming characteristic. This passage, which is of striking applicability, is as true in substance as it is felicitous in form: "A doubt may fairly be entertained whether this incessant speaking before public assemblies on emotional subjects does not tend to disturb that equilibrium of head and heart which it is always so desirable to preserve—whether, by giving an injurious predominance to the feelings, it does not tend to swathe the intellect in a warm haze, thus making the perception, and consequent rendering of facts, indefinite, if not untrue." Appended to this pamphlet are also an extract from Tyndall's Manchester lecture and (in full) his paper on the "Scope and Limit of Scientific Materialism." This new and best edition of the Belfast Address will be mailed from this office for fifty cents.

A GENTLEMAN in Canada writes us that Mr. Stevens' article in THE INDEX of November 12, entitled "Who is the Criminal?" being shown to Mr. Angus, General Manager of the Bank of Montreal, was read by him to several of the prominent Directors. It must have been especially interesting to them just then. The capital of the Bank is twelve million dollars, gold, and stands at eighty per cent. premium,—original stockholders getting about fourteen per cent. interest; yet a Paying Teller in the Savings Department, handling about $50,000 daily, had received only $350 salary, and decamped in October with $22,000, which have not yet been recovered. The moral is not that robbery in such cases is justifiable, but that the iniquity of exposing men struggling with poverty to such enormous temptation is apt to work out its own natural punishment in embezzlement or defalcation. Robbery is robbery, whatever the temptation; but underpayment by wealthy corporations for valuable and responsible services is also robbery, none the less inexcusable and none the less likely to entail retribution for being committed under legal form. The great number of underpaid but honest employes who have the unused opportunity of robbing is one of the facts that reflect great glory on human nature; yet it is too seldom remembered, as it ought to be, to their honor.

THE CONFLICT OF CONSCIENCES.

Last week we pointed out that the primary cause of the daily intensifying hostility of the Roman Catholics to our public school system lies in the fact that the Roman Catholic Church does not possess absolute control of it, and that a loss is thus entailed upon the Church of a large proportion of its children. If the result of placing children under the influences of free secular education were only a gain to the Church, and not a loss, we should hear nothing of the present protest. The Catholic Church rests upon dogmas; these dogmas are contrary to natural reason, and in civilized countries seldom command assent unless they are early and persistently impressed on the mind in childhood; the only way to impress them is to have them taught to children authoritatively from the Catholic catechism by Catholic teachers; the only way to have Catholic teachers is to put the schools under Catholic management. Hence the Roman Church, holding that belief in its own dogmas is essential to salvation from an eternal hell, and seeing that they will not be long believed in this country even by its own followers unless the whole matter of education is under its own control, claims this control as a necessity to its own existence. It is a mistake to seek for the real secret of Catholic hostility to secular or "godless" schools anywhere except in the practical necessities of the Roman Catholic Church as an organization. The Church must perish if it does not succeed in the attempt to educate in its own way the rising generation of its own membership. It is a question of life or death. In proportion, therefore, to the devotedness of Roman Catholics in this country to their religion and Church is the strength of their determination either to control the public schools or else have schools of their own.

But the accomplishment of this object is fraught with great difficulty at present. The Catholics are in a minority, and estimate their own number at about ten millions, or a fourth of the population. They cannot, therefore, outvote the other three fourths, and thus openly assume control of the schools. Further, they are still too poor to establish schools of their own which can successfully compete with the public schools. They constitute a minority so large, however, that in some localities they have held the balance of power and compelled the dominant party to obey their will. Here lies for the present the greatest peril to the country of Catholic influence. Under the lead of their priests, the Catholics are easily induced, with a few exceptions, to stand as a unit in their political demands; and where, as in our large cities, they are numerous, their sectarian requirements have been consulted to a very injurious extent. The public school system would break down altogether in such localities, if the policy of concession should be followed for any length of time. Take the history of sectarian appropriations in New York city, as an illustration. In 1869, $214,960 of public funds were appropriated in that city to sectarian schools, of which $36,288 were apportioned to Protestant German and Hebrew schools, and $178,672 to Catholic schools. In 1870, the sectarian appropriations were $217,300, of which the Catholic schools received $182,295, and all others $35,005. In 1871, $179,088 were appropriated to sectarian schools, of which the Catholics received $155,140, and all others $23,948. In 1872, the sectarian appropriations were $142,890, of which the Catholics received $119,112, and all others $23,778. For that year it is said on good authority: "The Roman Catholic schools receive $15 for $1 given to all other church schools. It will also be observed that, as fast as the public moneys are being appropriated to build up the Roman Catholic schools, the children are withdrawn from the public schools, leaving them unoccupied." The effect of such a policy as this is to put fatal weapons into the hands of the enemies to free secular education; it enables them to build up sectarian schools of their own, and draw off the pupils of the public schools; it stimulates other sects to do the same thing; it breaks down the whole system of unsectarian public instruction; it increases the cost and decreases the thoroughness of the education imparted to the rising generation; it saps the very foundation of republican institutions. And for what? To drill the children of the republic in the dogmas of a Church which preaches absolute submission to a foreign prince, an infallible Pope.

But, however deplorable the consequences of the policy which strengthens the Catholic Church in its warfare on our public schools, it is necessary to appreciate the reasons for this warfare. The attack is made in the sacred name of conscience: the defence is made in the same sacred name. A conflict of consciences is the result. What shall be done?

This is substantially the Catholic's protest: "You tax me for the support of public schools to which I cannot in good conscience send my children. My religion requires that they should be trained in schools where they may receive daily instruction from Catholic teachers in the Catholic faith; and whether you make your public schools Protestant or godless, they cannot meet this requirement. If I waive my scruples, I do it at the peril of my own and my children's salvation. You have no right to tax me for the support of schools from all the benefits of which I am debarred by my religion, and thus disable me to support schools to which I can conscientiously send my children. Therefore I claim that you should either make your schools Catholic by submitting them to the management of the Catholic clergy, or divide the school funds, or exempt me from paying my school-tax altogether."

If the State would but make the public schools thoroughly and consistently secular by the exclusion of the Bible and the discontinuance of all religious exercises, this is the answer it might justly make: "I do not tax you to support any religion at all; I do not in the slightest degree interfere with any religion you may happen to believe in; I leave you at perfect liberty to believe your own faith and to teach it to your children at home, at church, wherever you please except at my schools. These schools are the common ground for all children to meet and be taught the reading, writing, arithmetic, and so forth, which all children need to know. I do not ask any more of their time than is necessary to teach them these necessary things; if you teach them yourself in your voluntary Catholic schools, you cannot teach them these things in any less time. All the rest of the day you may use in drilling your children in Catholic doctrines, if you choose; it is none of my business what you do with them out of school hours. But it is the dictate of my own conscience to guarantee to every child at least an opportunity for the education which shall open an honorable escape from pauperism and crime; and to save society from the expense and injury which pauperism and crime entail. You get the benefit of the schools in this general protection of society, whether you have children or not, and whether you send your own to school or not; and I claim the right to tax you, because every citizen is bound by justice to all other citizens to pay his just and equal share of all public burdens. I tax you for the schools just as I tax you for the courts, whether you ever have a law-suit or not; you get your equivalent in the general security which the strict administration of justice ensures. Your school-tax is not payment of the bills for the instruction of your own children; it is your share of the total expense of making this an educated rather than an ignorant country, with all the innumerable advantages which the general education of society bestows on every citizen. If you cannot send your children to these schools conscientiously, I am sorry for it, but cannot excuse you; for my own conscience requires that I provide at least a chance for every child to receive a decent education in the most important and elementary branches of knowledge. You too must pay for what you get, or you defraud your fellow-citizens; you get the public benefits of the schools as much as they, and to excuse you from your tax would be to overtax and therefore rob them. I cannot, therefore, excuse you from your school-tax; I cannot divide the school funds among the sects, because that would be taxing the whole people for the support of many totally conflicting creeds,—a thing as unjust as it would be absurd; and I cannot give the control of the schools to your Catholic clergy, because that would outrage the Protestants, the Jews, the freethinkers, whose right to control the schools is every whit as good as yours. If you are a reasonable being, you will admit the justice of this decision; but if not, I cannot help it. I respect your scruples, but cannot act on them; for the law I obey is the law of EQUAL RIGHTS FOR ALL."

We do not suppose that this answer will satisfy the Catholics; for it remains true that the free school and the Church are irreconcilable, and that the prosperity of the one is the death of the other. There is here a direct conflict of consciences; both cannot be satisfied; neither can yield voluntarily; and the unenlightened conscience must in the end give way to the enlightened, by the sheer logic and force of events. The struggle is inevitable—let it come!

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The message of President Grant ought to allay the apprehensions and disarm the indignation which were naturally and properly excited by the first news of the late disturbance in Louisiana. The President distinctly disavows the usurpation of which he at first seemed to be guilty. He states that he knew nothing of the occurrence till the following morning, and had given no orders or suggestions with reference to it. He disclaims emphatically all right to interfere with the organization of a State Legislature, and, by referring to "circumstances which seem to exempt the military from any intentional wrong in the matter," recognizes by implication that the military were unintentionally wrong. It is well that the President has thus cleared his skirts; for to forestall even apprehended revolution by illegal interference would be itself revolutionary. Nothing but open rebellion could justify such interference. Whatever usurpation has actually occurred must now be charged directly upon the Governor of the State, who assumed that certain members of the assembled Legislature were not rightfully such, and called upon the United States troops to eject them. If this Legislature was a "mob," the fact must be proved to demonstration, or Governor Kellogg should be forthwith impeached. But shall it be conceded that the presence of five members whose seats are contested converts a regularly convened Legislature into a "mob"? It will never do in the world to make such a concession, or to justify the extraordinary proceedings based upon it. What the President himself admits is "perhaps a debatable question,"—namely, whether the Governor had any right to meddle in the matter,—is a question which ought to be debated at once; especially when the Governor who is so ready to meddle had United States troops at his command. Kindness to the blacks, kindness to the whites, kindness to the whole country, demands that this all-important constitutional question shall not be covered up or ignored. The President has meant well and done well; and if he has erred in recognizing and sustaining the Kellogg government, Congress itself must shoulder the blame and rectify the blunder. Is Louisiana really in armed rebellion? Then let Congress abolish this farce of a State government, and establish a military or territorial government outright. But if not, then let Congress order a new election, protect the rights of both whites and blacks at the polls, regardless of party politics, and give the distracted State such a government as the people really want. They have had enough of this half-horse, half-alligator Kellogg monstrosity, begotten in fraud and suckled on corruption; and the people of the North are sick of being held responsible for its misdeeds. The Republican party cannot now turn savagely against the President, and make him their scape-goat; if they fail to do swift justice to Louisiana, impartially protecting whites and blacks in all their rights, they have chosen their last President for many a year. Indignation meetings will not save them, especially when they get indignant at the wrong parties. Nothing will save them but justice, wisdom, and courage.

THE BOSTON WHITE LEAGUE.

For some years the State of Louisiana has been the seat of domestic violence and disorder. Fraud has characterized every political movement; political murders as barbarous as those of Caligula have been committed with impunity; an organization whose object is the subjugation of the black race has overthrown the State government, and, when driven from power by United States troops, sullenly retired only to commit fresh assassinations and to plot anew for the success of its Satanic schemes. The President of the United States, having appealed in vain to Congress to perform its duty, attempted to bring order out of chaos, to restore good government to Louisiana, and to protect her citizens against armed mobs and lawless bandits. Sensible of the grave responsibility imposed upon him by a derelict Congress, he interfered only when it became evident that the State and local authorities were impotent, and after the Governor of the State, the man recognized as such by the United States courts and one branch of Congress, had called for his assistance. The President understood his business; he comprehended the situation. Other men would have sent down to New Orleans some half-hearted martinet, only to be captured by McEnery and Wiltz. General Grant was wiser. After some delay, resulting in more violence and bloodshed, he sent General Phil. Sheridan, an efficient officer, a man who knows a rebel when he sees him, a man who knows the meaning of the word white as interpreted by Southern dictionaries.

The result justified his wisdom. Sheridan performed the work assigned him. The details of his performance are sufficiently well known, and I need not repeat them. Once more the usurping bandits were defeated. Hitherto they had succeeded in inaugurating riot and revolution, and in murdering many of their opponents before they were compelled to yield. In this last encounter they were ignominiously routed, and effectually cowed without injury to any one. Reporting his success to his superior, Sheridan told the truth about Louisiana as a brave, honest subordinate would tell it; and immediately a howl went up from every negro-hater in the South, from his copperhead allies in the North; and even well-meaning but weak-kneed Republicans trembled at the audacity of the man who had dared to throttle this new rebellion.

Of course the White Leagues howl and gnash their teeth in the presence of their master. And now a new rôle is to be played; now they are "on their good behavior;" now they are law-abiding citizens, clamoring for Sheridan's removal because, as they allege, he has violated the Constitution; and in the name of Law and Liberty they call upon the loyal North to sustain them. Yesterday a lawless mob, usurping the functions of State government and shooting down negroes: to-day peaceable, law-abiding patriots, anxious defenders of Constitutional rights! Their appeal is of course answered. Every political enemy of General Grant sees his opportunity. In the Senate Mr. Schurz hastens to condemn the Administration. He arraigns and denounces General Grant for violating the Constitution, and he does this with full knowledge that soon the President will report to Congress on the subject. The Senator was afraid to wait for that report. He rendered a verdict before he had heard the evidence. His anxiety to assault the President led him to play the part of a cowardly partisan.

But I wish to notice more especially the response made in the city of Boston. An indignation meeting was called, to be held in Faneuil Hall. Before the President had spoken, the people were asked to strike him down, and to tender their sympathy to Louisiana rebels. Every copperhead in Boston, every murderous Ku-Klux villain in the South, was cheered and comforted by the call for that meeting. Before it could be convened, however, the President's message was received. We all know its effect. Honorable men were ashamed of their hot haste; loyal men saw they had been tricked into an alliance with copperheads and rebels; all men recognized that the President was vindicated. No one could read the message without being convinced that, in all that he has done, the President has acted in the interest of good government, and without the shadow of a desire to exalt the military at the sacrifice of the civil office. In the light of this calm, statesmanlike message, the bluster about military usurpation, by which some good men had been misled, became ridiculous. If a technical violation of Constitutional law had been committed (for one I do not believe that this was done), the error was so manifestly in the interest of order, law, and the security of life and property, as to disarm at least all but friendly criticism. Not a semblance of warrant for indignant protest was left for anybody; and as a consequence it was broadly intimated by many that the Faneuil Hall meeting should be abandoned. After this the meeting became simply a meeting of the Boston White League, aided and abetted by a few loyal men who had not the courage or sagacity to withdraw: and, in so far as it professed to represent the citizens of Boston, it was a gross misrepresentation. The resolutions have been published, the speeches have been read, and the sequel is well known. The White League of Louisiana invaded Faneuil Hall, expecting the people to answer to the roll-call. The answer was in harmony with the memories that cluster around the sacred old temple. The people heard with creditable patience all that could be said in denunciation of Grant and Sheridan, and in praise of the "forbearance" of whipped rebels; and then, through the voice of Wendell Phillips, a voice always heard on the side of true liberty, the real sentiments of Boston found expression. Point by point Mr. Phillips followed out the argument, repeatedly calling upon the White League lawyers to controvert him. Silently they deserted the platform; and, when at length the orator had finished, the gentleman who had offered the resolutions declared to the audience, "I feel like saying, 'God be merciful to me, a sinner!'" A jest, if you please, but none the less an inspiration. Faneuil Hall was redeemed; the good name of the city was saved from dishonor; and the organization of a permanent Boston White League was indefinitely postponed.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

The week of prayer, an institution of some years' standing, a creation of the Evangelical Alliance, closed on January 10. It was remarkable less for the crowded attendance at the churches, or the fervor of the supplications, than for the objects petitioned for and the spirit by which the combined assault on the "Throne of Grace" was animated. By the published arrangement, Monday was devoted to a grateful and contrite review of the past, humble confession of public and private sins, and prayer for guidance and strength in the future. Tuesday was set apart for national objects; for persons in authority, rulers and legislators, soldiers and sailors, rich and poor, prisoners and captives, the afflicted and bereaved, the oppressed and persecuted. Wednesday was home day, when prayers were offered for children, for parents, for guardians and tutors, for schools and colleges, Sunday-schools and ministers. On Thursday, foreign objects for prayer were proposed; the extension of religious liberty throughout the world, the prevalence of peace among nations, the increase of harmony, sympathy, and service among Christians of all lands, the subordination of commercial, secular, and scientific interests to the cause of righteousness. Friday was filled with supplication in behalf of missions; for the spread of the gospel in heathen lands, the conversion of the house of Israel, and the deliverance of nations from the yoke of superstition. On Saturday, the faithful petitioned that the Holy Spirit might be poured out on the churches throughout the world, to the increase of their zeal, spirituality, devotedness, and a clearer witness for the truth among men. The theme generally indicated for the sermons of Sunday was the essential unity of Christ's Church, and the obligation binding on all its members to manifest it "in the bond of peace."

It is much more than probable that the Orthodox mind gave very narrow interpretations to the scope of these petitions; but to one who reads the language according to its English meaning, without technical limitation or sectarian prejudice, the scheme for the week of prayer presented material for very agreeable reflection. The spirit seems to have been unusually generous and sweet. Saving the prayer for the conversion of the house of Israel, there is scarcely a suggestion of the ancient bigotry which marked similar projects a few years ago. The petitions for the spread of the gospel in heathen lands, for the subordination of secular interests to the kingdom of Christ, contain nothing acrid in the form of denunciation, slur, or innuendo. Whatever of bitterness may be implied or hidden, no phrase betrays the presence of bad blood.

The objects of prayer were moral, social, spiritual in a large sense; peace, concord, sympathy between nations, extension of religious liberty, suppression of superstition, the consecration of homes and schools, the increase of Christian fidelity, sincerity in heart and purpose, a living in place of a traditional faith. They are such objects as, reasonably understood, the wisest and best always pray for. They are the dearest interests of mankind, of supreme importance to all people without exception or distinction. If the whole Christian community could in good earnest give for the space of a whole week its full mind and heart to meditation on these high matters, and to intense desire for them, the circumstance would indicate a mighty change in the temper of Christendom.

Thoughts like these came to me as I read over the published scheme of the meetings, and in my hopeful mind arose visions of a wiser, sweeter, and nobler era to dawn on the religious world. But the Times of Sunday morning informed its readers that a call had been signed by a number of distinguished clergymen of Brooklyn, without regard to creed, inviting clergy and laity to attend a prayer-meeting at Dr. Talmage's tabernacle at 4.15 o'clock, P. M., and spend an hour in prayer "for a mighty outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the city of Brooklyn." This announcement dispelled all my fine anticipations. No doubt, Brooklyn is as good a place as any to spend effort on, at present; no city, not even Washington, seems to be in greater need of a holy spirit. But that prominent men should openly avow a belief that, by a special rally at a particular moment, the Holy Ghost can be compelled to visit a designated spot, and then and there to perform a miracle of moral regeneration, is discouraging; and that secular papers should publish such a call without a word of expostulation or even comment is astounding. It was no cheap pulpit rhetoric then: the description of prayer as "the rope up in the belfry; we pull it and it rings the bell in heaven." The divine who compared prayer to the winding up of a clock which must be done at stated times, lest the works stop, was indulging in no clap-trap, but talking sober sense! The conspiracy against the turpitudes of Brooklyn took effect; the meeting was held; the volleys of prayer were discharged from loud-mouthed guns at the celestial citadel. The papers of the next morning reported no spiritual convulsion in the sister city. There is no heavenly summer there. The great scandal cause comes on: there is probably no diminution in the falsehood that is meditated, the hate that is cherished, the chicanery that has been resorted to, the perjury that has been practised, the hypocrisy that has been assumed. The moral blackness of the city is only made more appalling to view by the density of the superstition that fancies guilt can be so removed.

It is high time that emphasis were laid on the immorality of prayer, as understood by Christian people. The irrationality of it has been made evident to intelligent men. The weakness of it as a delusion has been exposed often and often. But there is something much graver than this to be considered. Faith in prayer as a means of obtaining mental, moral, spiritual, or social gifts, or of averting physical or other evils, is practically immoral, and immoral in proportion to the vitality of the faith. No persuasion could be more fatally disorganizing to individuals and to a community than that the best things can be had for the asking, for any asking, even the most sincere and heartfelt. What if the crying importunity of the poor could make them rich? What if the agonizing supplication of the sick could make them well? What if the passionate clamor of the stupid could make them wise? What if the desperate moaning of the weak and tempted could make them strong and pure? The moral constitution of the world depends on the law that we shall earn whatever we possess, and pay for all we own. No greater misfortune could befall mankind than to believe that hospitals and asylums like George Müller's may be sustained by prayer; for such a belief would, if seriously entertained, paralyze the merciful action of the heart and reduce to a ghastly mechanism the spontaneous feelings of pity and good-will. The assurance of a personal care in the heavens may be precious to the heart, but it is dearly purchased by the sacrifice of man's moral responsibility and immediate social agency. The Christian belief in prayer for spiritual, no less than for material, gifts is of the very essence of superstition, and, like any other superstition, should be condemned unhesitatingly. To pray "that superstition may be made to cease," is simply to pray that prayer itself may cease, and that earnest moral aspiration for rational attainment may take its place.

SPIRITUALISM.

For about a quarter of a century, what is known as Spiritualism has had a prominent place in the religious and social history of this country; and, from time to time during this long period, has more or less markedly challenged public attention. Quite recently, the whole subject has been discussed with unusual animation, owing to the occurrence of certain remarkable "manifestations" in different parts of the country, and to the fact that the fraudulent character of some have met with signal exposure, while others still persevere to maintain the appearance at least of genuineness.

At no period of my life have I ever been a Spiritualist. I am not one now, and have no reason to suppose that I ever shall be. Nevertheless, I should consider it scarcely creditable either to my intellect or my heart if I were indifferent or contemptuous towards a subject which so vitally affects the hopes and fears, the thoughts and sentiments, of so large a number of men and women, as does Spiritualism; especially when I know that it is the cherished faith of millions both in the Old World and the New, whose ranks I suppose to be every year increasing, and the mental and moral capacity of some of whom I believe there is every reason profoundly to respect. I do not find myself able, as apparently some do, to sweep away with a gesture of fine disdain all the "phenomena" of Spiritualism, on the ground that they are opposed to what is called science, and because some of them have been proved clearly to be spurious. I am not aware that there is any man or any number of men who can show authority for deciding what exactly is unscientific, or for setting up a bench of science which shall be justified in ruling out such evidence as Spiritualism has been always only too eager to offer. I cannot forget that some men are Spiritualists, whose works and discoveries in the fields of science have entitled them fairly to no inconsiderable scientific renown, and who have patiently and cautiously investigated such evidence as Spiritualism has to offer, arriving at the conclusion that in the case presented it was valid, complete, and satisfactory; so that while my own judgment has never been convinced, nor my own entire belief in Spiritualism secured, by any evidence that has come so far within my observation, I must at the same time allow that some who are wiser than myself have been more successful in their search, and indeed have had their minds carried on by it to perfect conviction.

Nor does it seem to me fair to conclude that all the "phenomena" of Spiritualism must be spurious because some are. These "phenomena" have been occurring for a long series of years, in nearly every city and town in the northern and western States, in many private families as well as in public assemblies; and in many cases not only have they persistently baffled the utmost skill of sceptics to prove them fraudulent, but have forced the conviction of their genuineness on the minds of numbers who have striven to resist such evidence. The tricks of pretended "mediums" have been exposed again and again; but this is no more true than that, again and again, the genuine "manifestations" of honest "mediums" have triumphed over every art of sceptical investigation, and have fully established themselves as unquestionable realities. Indeed, when we remember for how long a time and in what numbers of cases these "phenomena" have occurred, to believe and say that deceit has been practised in every case, and wholesale lying and unmitigated fraud, is practically to restate and reinforce the horrible old doctrine of total human depravity. Orthodox Christians may not be loth to believe thus badly of their fellow men; but radicals ought to do better. Every one must rejoice (and none more than every honest Spiritualist) when exposure lights upon the heads of "mediumistic" tricksters and liars; but to rush to the conclusion that all "mediums" are unvarnished and dishonest, and all Spiritualists deluded and superstitious, is to plunge into a moral scepticism the effect of which would be quite as bad as that of real superstition itself.

For one, I experience a thorough satisfaction in the persistency with which these "phenomena" continue to occur, and in the circumstance that so many of them are able to establish themselves upon the basis of fact. What the ultimate explanation of them may be I do not pretend to foresee. The cause of them may turn out to be "spirits." If I were absolutely certain that any disembodied spirits existed, I should think it more probable that these are they who are "manifesting" themselves to the world at this time. I entirely respect all who so believe, for I am sure that they at least think they have good reason for such belief. And I take no stock at all in that dogmatic materialism, or that dogmatic science, which pretends to know that the Spiritualist's explanation of these "phenomena" is false. I do not believe that anybody knows any such thing; and I am glad that the "phenomena" persist in bothering such oracles of wisdom, and in challenging their sharpest wits to explain and get around them. But I suppose that I am one of those who are inclined to base whatever belief they have in spiritual realities upon quite other than external or material evidence. I am not anxious to be convinced by "rappings" or table-tippings or "materializations" that my soul is immortal. In my best moods, when, as a friend expresses it, I "feel big" with infinity,—when I love, and hope, and aspire, and worship; when my soul is on freest and strongest wing,—then I am quite superior to any such testimony. Let those lean upon it who cannot get along without it. Every one to his constitutional diet! These ladies and gentlemen of the skies are welcome to visit me if they want to. I shall not shut my doors against them. But so far I am able to find society here on earth quite as good as theirs; and, if they please, I am willing to wait until I shall be regularly introduced to them after "the old, old fashion."

But if these "phenomena" should result in proving to us, as I think they may, that the mind or the spirit in the body is something much more wonderful than any of us have known or been apt to suppose, I shall welcome that demonstration with sincere delight and gratitude. To this end, if no other, I pray they may continue; and I hope that as few of us as possible will lose our senses or our temper while this process of demonstration is going on.

HARRIOT K. HUNT, M.D.:

DIED JAN. 2, 1875: AGED 69.

As we stood quietly around the coffin which held the lifeless body of this so loving woman, and looked upon the earnest faces of those who had gathered to pay spontaneous reverence to a good and useful life, there was no gloom or sadness in the earnest feeling with which all remembered the life which had been lived out in that humble home. The strong, firm features, pallid and still now, had no ghastly expression of death; they looked massive and noble, as if the genius of life had sculptured them as Michel Angelo's genius might have done in clay or marble; and it seemed as if the occasion called for some free, spontaneous utterance of the thoughts that were welling up in the hearts of those who stood around, recalling what she had been to them and to humanity. Not fulsome eulogy belongs to her; a thorough realism was in place here. Harriot K. Hunt was no angel and no saint; she had her faults, her peculiarities, and her prejudices. We would not forget them if we could, for they serve to mark out the strong characteristic traits of her nature. But in the idealizing presence of death we do not care to speak of them; there we remembered first the grand vital force which was in this woman. How she loved life and respected its uses—loved it for herself and valued it for others! It seemed impossible to think of that strong individuality as being annihilated; it was too real a force! What she was, loving, working, thinking, all her life long, she must be now. For never did saint or mystic more constantly blend the thought of immortality, the presence of higher natures with the things of to-day, than this strong, practical, common-sense woman.

She was thoroughly religious, for everything was looked at by her in its universal relations. She was pious, too, and had the greatest delight in psalm and hymn, and loved to pour out her own soul in prayer and exhortation. She belonged to the Swedenborgian Church, and found great edification in the correspondences and visions of the Swedish seer. But, loving her own religious home, she could not and would not be fettered by its limitations, but was just as much at her ease in a Methodist or Universalist pulpit, and found sympathy with radicals and religionists of all sorts, even including the Shakers, among whom she had many dear friends.

With this clinging love of forms and rites, she was still a bold protestant and reformer by nature, and could stand all alone and carry out her purposes against all opposition, when the times required it. She felt the need of woman as a physician to minister to her own sex, and she sought for the education which would fit her for her calling; but when Harvard College shut its doors in her face, "she turned round and excommunicated" the college, sought information wherever she could get it, and, relying upon the strong intuitions of her own rich nature, she gave her patients the best advice she could, and, as she always considered their spiritual, intellectual, and moral conditions as well as their physical, she often succeeded where learned doctors failed, who could not "minister to a mind diseased." Harvard College refused to allow her to earn its diploma; but her patients, restored to health and life, and finding in her a life-long counsellor and friend, gave her their diploma of love and trust. Her hearty, cheery presence in the sick room was itself a potent influence of good, and her utter refusal to let her patients die sometimes reconciled them to living.

She was as broad in her medical sympathies as in her religious, and tried allopathy, or hydropathy, or homoeopathy, magnetism, electricity, or the herbs of "old Indian doctors," if by any means she could find a weapon against her great enemy, disease. That she stood at great disadvantage for the want of regular intellectual training, she knew as well as others; and she rejoiced greatly to see younger women coming into the profession who had been blessed with the educational advantages which she had not. But she went to work with such tools as she had, and fought a brave fight which has made the way easier for those who came after her.

The "emancipation of woman" was the great interest of her life. She stopped by the way to give a helping hand to the slave, to the drunkard, to all suffering humanity; but she never lost sight of the great crime against justice in excluding woman from legislation, and year after year went up her protest, with her taxes, against this fundamental wrong. It would be pleasant to dwell on a hundred other traits of this many-sided woman, in whom strength and weakness, grim earnestness and childish frolic, stern justice and tender love, plain common sense and exuberant fancy, were so richly and strangely blended; but we cannot do it now. She has herself written out her life nearly to its close, and her great regret in dying was that she could not finish her work. May loving hands take it up, and carry it on to its completion.

Grimm describes his feelings at seeing the illumination of St. Peter's, as he stood alone in the shadow of a pillar on the grand square, after the busy crowd had gone. In the flood of light, all the petty details of the building were lost; all the imperfections of modern additions were concealed; he saw only the grand lines of the master's thought, as they were clearly conceived in his own mind. So in the grand illuminating light of the eternal world which glorifies the departed, we forget all that was transient or faulty or insufficient in the petty details of life, and see the master lines of this brave, true woman's thought, as in her seventy years of life she built her temple in the love of God.

"LARGE AND SMALL FAMILIES."

MR. EDITOR:—

It has not been my good fortune to hear Carl Schurz' lecture on "Educational Problems," and I get my first impressions of his opinions on the true sphere of woman from an article headed "Large and Small Families," in THE INDEX of January 7. I read, also, with a great deal of interest, the comments and criticisms contained in the same article.

I am compelled to differ from A. W. S. in several particulars, but should not venture to express an opinion in your columns did I not feel that on a matter of so much importance, occupying as it does, also, so much of the best thought of liberal minds, even the undisciplined thought of an uneducated man may be of value in suggesting ideas from another stand-point.

To Mr. Schurz' opinion of the functions of woman in society, A. W. S. presents two objections, neither of which is, I think, sound.

The first is, that large families "tend to perpetuate poverty, which is one of the chief causes of ignorance and crime." He goes on to say that, "if only those who are well-to-do in life, who have ample means to carefully educate and care for numerous children,—if only such would have large families, comparatively little would be found to say against it." I have italicized the latter part of this admission, because I think that the admission itself, if properly considered, is sufficiently comprehensive to overthrow the first objection. It seems to me, Mr. Editor, that the apparent impossibility of making this admission is based upon the assumption that the existence of the extreme disparity of classes, which every one seems to look upon as inevitable and in accordance with the divine idea, is, in fact, unavoidable and not caused by anything fundamentally wrong in our system of society. I, for one, do not admit that poverty is a divine institution, but believe rather that it is a hateful wrong that mankind will some day, by a proper understanding of, and compliance with, the eternal laws that govern human relations, entirely remove. Now, sir, what kind of an argument against large families can that be which is based upon the fact that "large families" do not harmonize with "poverty"?

Should we not rather set ourselves earnestly at work to discover what hidden cause—what false principle in our social system hitherto accepted as true—is responsible for the very existence of poverty in our midst, rather than to institute social changes and so-called reforms on the foundation of wrongs already existing?

The second objection is physiological rather than sociological in its character, and on this account I am more diffident in expressing an opinion, being altogether destitute of the necessary scientific knowledge; but I cannot avoid calling attention to one passage which seems to me to be erroneous. It commences thus: "A woman is a woman before she is a wife and a mother." I disagree with this definition of womanhood and of all the reasoning based upon it.

The contrary appears to me to be true: a woman is not a woman until she is a wife and a mother. In the same sense, a man is not a man until he becomes a husband and a father.

Until they have both taken upon themselves the full duties and responsibilities involved in the legitimate propagation of their species, which is the self-evident intention of Nature that they should do, they are simply undeveloped men and women; nothing more.

Man and woman are not separate, perfect, independent individuals, but are the natural complements of each other; neither complete without the other; the two together forming one full individuality. Man has functions, mental as well as physical, absent in woman. Woman has functions, mental as well as physical, absent in man. They are co-equal but not independent. The greatest possible happiness for either cannot be realized apart.

In the joint work of their lives, the question is, What are the functions for which each is best adapted? This question is made difficult to answer, because, up to this time (and probably for many years to come), the conditions of society in other respects are not and will not be in harmony with the divine order of Nature, and consequently unfitted for the proper growth and development of either, or for a proper distinction of the duties which each seems intended to fulfil.

In all our attempts at social reform we seem to make the mistake of not going deep enough to secure a true foundation. The founders of this republic made this mistake,—partly from ignorance and partly from cowardice. For instance, they left a quicksand under one corner of their edifice—slavery—which well-nigh brought it to the ground. It has cost something, and will cost more yet, to underpin the social fabric so as to make all parts equally secure. And now there are signs of a general sinking all over; perhaps they did not, after all, reach the "bottom rock." When they declared, as a self-evident principle, that "All men are born free and equal," perhaps they failed to make provisions for the security of that freedom and equality.

We know that, in any important sense of the words, men are not at this day "free and equal," far from it.

But this is a digression, and only intended to show that, in any social changes we propose, it is not safe to base our arguments upon any existing arrangements, which may be themselves wrong. As Dr.

Clarke says, we must "take hold of things by the right handle."

My answer, then, to the second objection of A. W. S. to large families, is similar to my answer to the first; that, supposing it were true that, under present social conditions and in the present state of our knowledge, it is inconvenient and perhaps injurious to woman to bear large families, the remedy is, not in taking measures to prevent the increase of life in the world, but rather in so remodelling the framework of society as to bring about the conditions essential for the fullest exercise and development of all the functions capable of yielding happiness to every man, woman, and child.

I must take the opportunity of this first communication to acknowledge the pleasure and advantage I have derived from a twelvemonth's reading of THE INDEX. I am poor, and cannot afford the luxury of many papers; but THE INDEX would be the last I should relinquish.

In answer to your appeal to your friends to bring in new subscribers, I propose that you invite all your subscribers everywhere on a definite day, named by you, to be your canvassing agents.

Let us make a simultaneous advance on the enemy's works all along the line for liberty and freedom of thought. Truly yours, W. G. H. S.

Boston, Jan. 10, 1875.

[If each of our subscribers would determine without fail to secure one new subscriber before February 1, our list would be doubled, and the influence of THE INDEX multiplied tenfold. Cannot this be done? We need such help as this very greatly, and thank Mr. S. for his suggestion.—ED.]

TYNDALL'S ADDRESS AND ITS CRITICS.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Mr. Weiss says (INDEX, Nov. 5) that Tyndall has been misunderstood, and that the misunderstanding is chiefly of "that portion of the address which contrasted the old mechanical idea of a lifeless matter with the new idea which Tyndall espoused, that matter has eternally contained all the germs of all the things which have appeared, and all the forces needed to make them appear;" and that we are reduced to the choice of accepting "the old theory that everything has been created out of dead matter by the successive acts of a live creator, or the theory that the universe is live matter in various forms and stages of development."

Weiss and Tyndall strangely forget that the Tyndall idea is not new. Ueberweg, like all other historians of philosophy, shows that it was taught by Pagan philosophers from six hundred years before Christ. He says: "The philosophy of the earlier Ionic physiologists is hylozoism; i.e., the doctrine of the immediate unity of matter and life, according to which matter is endowed with life, and life inseparably connected with matter." [Life inherent in matter; "endowed" is a wrong term.] To the succession of the early Greek hylozoists, Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes, Ueberweg says he is justified in adding Heraclitus.

James Freeman Clarke says ("Apropos of Tyndall," Galaxy, December) that Tyndall is using the term matter in a new sense, not as meaning the underlying substance of sensible phenomena, but as something conjectural, an imaginary substance, and unknowable. He says, as to the phenomena of life, Tyndall has given merely a new name for spirit, or that Great Being out of "which or whom" proceed all the phenomena of body and soul. You tell us that Tyndall's doctrine is essentially the same as that which he held six years ago. But this is not true. Tyndall has now expressed a belief in eternally living matter; and says: "All the phenomena of physical nature, as well as those of the human mind, have their unsearchable roots in a cosmical life." And Clarke says, by cosmical life Tyndall probably means what Cudworth meant by "plastic life;" and that by using the term as a new name for the Great Being, "all the significance of the famous sentence [about matter containing the promise and potency of every form of life] is lost;" therefore, says Clarke, "there is no materialism and no atheism in it;" unless the doctrine of "plastic substances or vital natures," which Cudworth used to refute all atheism, leads to atheism.

Now Tyndall admits that there is materialism in the sentence, but not the materialism of dead matter; and, as regards atheism, Tyndall would not admit that he means by cosmical life what Cudworth meant by plastic life or natures. Cudworth maintained that the secondary causes of all organisms are artificial natures working in complete subordination to the Deity. Tyndall did not mean this; the illustrations which he gives show that he thinks with Lucretius that matter can produce of itself "every form and quality of life," "without the meddling of the gods;" but matter having inherent life, not such matter as was pictured by Lucretius. Tyndall makes Bishop Butler ask the disciple of Lucretius if he "can in any way imagine how, out of the mechanical shock or action of individually dead atoms, sensation, emotion, and thought are to arise?" and says: "We naturally and rightly reject the monstrous notion that out of such matter any form of life could possibly arise." If Tyndall believed (which may be doubted, though he incidentally says it) that God created matter, he thinks, as Epicurus did, that God has not troubled himself to fashion it.

Cudworth was opposed to hylozoism, but such is the difficulty of refuting atheism that, in the opinion of Bayle, all Cudworth's learning on the subject contributed to the showing of hylozoism; to the very doctrine in which Tyndall still believes, as indicated in his Manchester lecture. Bayle said: Cudworth has, by his supposition of plastic substances which have the power of forming plants and animals without knowing what they do, "weakened the most sensible argument for the existence of God from the admirable structure observed in the universe;" for, says Bayle, if these substances can produce the organization of animals without knowing what they do, the atheist will conclude that the formation of the regularity observed in the world is not inconsistent with the want of knowledge; and so the world may be the effect of a blind cause. Bayle says that Leibnitz acknowledged the justness of this retort of the atheist; and that we cannot, by supposing intelligent causes, refute the atheists who say that the world may have been produced without the operation of an intelligent cause.

Clarke says Tyndall rejects the doctrine of creation, in which Deity is regarded as working upon matter from without after the manner of an artificer, but accepts that of evolution, which, Clarke says, is not atheism; certainly not, for a God may be who has arranged the evolutions, or he may be, and yet may not have "meddled" with earthly evolutions, which Tyndall indicates to be his belief. Tyndall did not, and does not now, profess to believe in direct or indirect creative acts. In his Manchester lecture, he declared that he is not an atheist; but he has found that he lives in an age when a man in his position may not define the kind of God that he thinks may exist. He exhibited some wonderful movements in molecules, and left it to his audience to say whether all the phenomena of the world are the result of "an organic growth—a single natural process from the beginning;" or whether the passage from inorganic to organic forms "requires for their introduction special creative acts." He has not modified his assertion, though he avoided reiterating it, that in matter is "the promise and potency of every form and quality of life." Epicurus was a materialist; he believed in the existence of gods, but he said they left matter to take its own way, that they did not interfere with the world, and that man had nothing to hope or fear from them.

Yours respectfully,
JOHN CHAPPELLSMITH.

WOMEN SHOULD BE VOTERS.

YANKTON, Dakota Territory, Jan. 3, 1875.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Mr. Holland, in THE INDEX of December 17 (article, "Ignorant Voters"), gives statistics showing that the country contains more illiterate women than men, and concludes that we should still withhold the ballot because there are already too many ignorant voters for the purity of politics.

He also demands to know what use would be made of the power, if we gave it?

If I steal my neighbor's horse, and am overtaken by the owner, demanding his property, by what right do I require to know the use he intends to make of the animal before I give up the reins? Perhaps he intends to use him as the swift agent of my arrest. Be it so! My fate is just; the law is executed, and right and truth have prevailed. Such a demand could only be made by the same spirit of selfishness which prompted the theft, and would result in insult added to injury.

No! My wisest course, as a matter of policy as well as principle, would be instantly to relinquish my plunder into the hands of its rightful owner, and proceed to make every reparation in my power.

But where human rights are concerned, no true reformer stops to consider questions of policy. "Hands off!" is the only thing in order, and the only thing which has the true ring of the spirit of liberty.

Why talk about "purity in politics" with half the race disfranchised for the crime of being mothers instead of fathers?

If self-government is a human right at all, nothing can be more obvious than that it belongs to every individual by the mere fact of his or her existence; hence, so long as the very foundations of our government are based on wrong and injustice, none need expect the millennium through "purity in politics." No very exalted or protracted purity in that direction is possible, until men learn to regard woman as a factor of the political body. Since the world began, woman has been defrauded of her rights solely because she was not endowed with sufficient muscular power to cope with man as a brute. Now, unless might makes right, it is the first duty of the hour, laying aside questions of expediency, to restore the harmony of Nature by doing justice to woman, and receive her for once in all history in her true position as a co-laborer; then advise with her as an equal on the contingencies to be met and adjustments to be made in the new relation.

As to the objection that she takes "but little interest in politics," allow me to suggest that, if Mr. Holland is a preacher and the law had prohibited him from occupying the sacred desk, he would have taken "but little interest in reading sermons."

Freedom for all the race! With results and outcomes we have nothing to do.

Respectfully, D. P. WILCOX.

EDITORS will appreciate the incident which is thus faintly hinted at by the Hartford Post: "The young man who came into this office this morning, sat down on a box, and then bounced up with a yell and fled like one bewitched, is requested to return four long brass tacks that stood on the box when he took his seat. No questions will be asked—we understand it all; but we want those tacks—we have use for them. That box is specially devoted to parties who not only read our exchanges but spirit them away, and the tacks are what we depend on for excitement."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, 10c per line.
" 13 " 25 "	8 "	" "	" "
" 26 " 51 "	6 "	" "	" "
" 52 "	5 "	" "	" "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,
has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently adopted to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES FOR 1875.

The Committee of the Free Religious Association, in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons, again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below,—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged:—

RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, 139 Federal St., Boston.
HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston.
CHARLES K. WHIPPLE, 19 Pinckney St., Boston.

REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD

For the Pianoforte.

It stands the test! Sells 25,000 yearly, and is gaining friends everywhere. No piano instruction-book ever issued approaches it for real merit and worth, and no teachers regret using it in their course of instruction. This work is a power in the musical advance of the day, and has been a most important agent in the recent tremendous increase of technical knowledge of the Pianoforte.

The success of RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD is world wide, and prompts many competitors; but its sale surpasses that of all others COMBINED, and it stands to-day incontestably superior to all other Piano Methods.

Used by thousands of Music Teachers, and sold by all Book and Music Dealers in this Country and Canada. PRICE $3.75.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———.

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

For List of Liberal Leagues, see next page.

GLIMPSES.

MR. JOHNSON'S lecture at Horticultural Hall last Sunday is highly praised by those who heard it.

THE SECOND RADICAL CLUB had a lively discussion last Monday evening on the labor question.

THE MORAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION will hold a meeting at 3 Tremont Place, Feb. 5, at 3 P. M. A paper will be read by Anna Monroe, M. D., on "The Great Evil." The public are invited.

THE Sixth Annual Convention of the New England Labor Reform League will be held in Boston, Sunday and Monday, January 31 and February 1, day and evening, in Cotton Hall, corner of Chauncy and Essex Streets.

A MISSIONARY at Yokohama—"one of the calmest and soundest of our veteran missionaries"—prophesies that in twenty-five years Japan will be Christian. It is a great deal more likely that by that time the United States will be Buddhist.

PROFESSOR W. C. WILKINSON says in the Independent that "the whole matter with Open Communion Baptists is a matter of temperament. The logic is all on one side of the question. It is feeling, stronger than reason, that makes any Baptist in this country an Open Communion Baptist."

MISSOURI has elected a Democratic ex-rebel general, named Cockerell, to the United States Senate instead of re-electing Carl Schurz. There are keen eyes just now on the watch to discover what the Democrats propose to do in case they secure a return to power. If the above is to be a fair sample of their intended doings, they will not have a chance to do much.

"PANTHEISM," says a writer in the Baptist Watchman and Reflector, "which sees Deity in a dung-hill and to whom [sic] Calvary and the nearest slaughter-house have an equal sanctity, is but another name for paganism. . . . There is to be a great strife between culture salvation and salvation by Christ." It is our philanthropic hope that this disciple of John the Immerser has been saved by Christ, for it is sufficiently clear that he will never be saved by culture.

FATHER STACK recently lectured in Philadelphia on the "Usurpation of the Roman Catholic Bishops in America," enlarging on their tyranny not only in ecclesiastical but also in civil matters. He advocated compulsory education, and protested against the attempt of the Catholic Church to throw obloquy on the public school system. Welcome to every such word as that! Father Stack will be excommunicated out of the Roman Church into the Church of Man; but he will only find himself in a larger place.

LAST Tuesday evening, by invitation of a few individuals who are interested in such subjects, we gave a lecture on "Tax-Exemption" in the Town Hall at Quincy, in this State. Mr. Josiah P. Quincy presided at the meeting. Only about one hundred persons were present, perhaps owing to the severe cold and perhaps not. But it is much to be desired that a more general public interest might be taken in a reform which is not only based on obvious justice, but would annually increase the State revenues by about $750,000.

IN ENGLAND every one who is not an adherent of the Established Church is stigmatized as a "Dissenter." Dissenter from what? From truth as established by law! In this country the law does not presume to establish truth at all, and there are no "Dissenters." Yet Orthodox talk of "unbelievers," "disbelievers," and "misbelievers," meaning want of belief in itself; whereas Orthodoxy is essentially want of belief in freedom of thought, the truth of science, the natural ethics of civilization, which are the only Established Religion of America.

THERE is a merchant by the name of Stokes, in London, who wants Professor Tyndall subjected to the penalties for "blasphemy" (whatever that may be). He says he does not want him punished by death, "but rather that his act should be branded with the condemnation of authority" by a two-years imprisonment. So he writes to the Home Secretary, declaring his belief that "the circulation of such pernicious trash must sooner or later be suppressed." If Stokes were only a Yankee, he would go into raptures over President Cummings and the Christian Amendment movement.

THE Custom-House returns show that 250,000 pounds of opium are annually imported into this country, which is ten times as much as was imported thirty years ago. In reply to specific questions put to druggists throughout the country, it is found that more than one-third of the whole amount is used for other than medicinal uses. Large quantities of opium, laudanum, and morphine are sold to individuals who use the drug for its stimulating effect. Dr. Hammond, of New York, avers that the increased use of opium is one of the results of "prohibitory laws." Surely opium-eating is even worse than ordinary intemperance. Let us not jump out of the frying-pan into the fire.

THIS is what the New York Times says about some recent speculations: "Whatever the condition of distracting doubt into which men like Mill may have reasoned themselves, we know in our hearts that the doctrines of Him whom such philosophers may regard as a self-denying enthusiast represent a religion of love and duty so far beyond all others that have ever been made known to man, that we can safely rest our hopes upon it here and hereafter. This faith, at least, is one that need not be shaken by all the teachings of all the Mills, and Huxleys, and Darwins, and Tyndalls that are seeking fact and teaching doubt the whole world over. It is above the reach of science and beyond the grasp of logic." But "we know in our hearts" nothing at all, since the "heart" is an organ of feeling, not of knowledge. The "head" knows all that is known. It is vain to seek refuge from modern thought in this manner; and every friend of his race should regret to see the prevailing dread of the human intellect in matters of religious belief. Surely, the intellect can never prove what is false; it can only prove what is true. If we are not afraid of truth, why be afraid of the intellect?

SABBATARIANISM has got the victory, after all. The outcry of the public (which is everywhere Orthodox, and not radical, when it comes to action, however tolerant it may be of radicalism which merely talks and rescind) has compelled the New York Postmaster to rescind his order establishing Sunday delivery of the mails. Such a pressure was immediately brought to bear upon him that he at once succumbed. Can men with eyes in their heads see no lesson in all this? Once show to the churches that the Christian Amendment is the only measure that can ultimately save their "Christian Sabbath," their Bible in schools, and so forth, and such a cry for it would go up as would astound and overwhelm the easy-going liberals who now pooh-pooh the very suggestion of danger in it. Not because the Orthodox are more numerous than the heterodox, for we do not believe that; but because they are organized thoroughly, and we not. If there were only a Liberal League to match every church, there would be a chance for justice, freedom, and equal rights to be respected. But as it is, they are trampled scornfully under foot, if they do but lay a finger on the least legal privilege of Orthodoxy. No wonder the Christian Amendment people exult over our defeat.

The English in India.

A LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE NEW ENGLAND WOMAN'S CLUB, JANUARY 4, 1875.

BY W. F. FORSYTH, OF LONDON.

It was about this very time two hundred and seventy-six years ago that Elizabeth signed the charter of the first East India Company. A few years later the Emperor at Delhi issued a firman permitting the representatives of the Company to trade. For a hundred years after this event the English pursued their calling as peace-loving traders, and it was not until they saw that to trade profitably they had to protect their factories with mud walls and bastions that they commenced to dot the surf-washed coasts with these toy forts, and struggled to secure a commercial ascendancy over their European rivals. For a long time it was a very unequal struggle. They were the last in the field, and with civil war and domestic dissensions, the English trader had neither the material support which the power of fleets yields, nor the moral force which the ambitious political designs of their statesmen gave to the French and Dutch competitors in the race for trade. If left to themselves they would have pursued their huckstering policy, and, bent on making money, the pursuit of wealth would have been their sole object; but French and Dutch were aggressive and troublesome. They made war on their factories, and tried to destroy, by their greater influence and power with local native princes, the slight concessions granted by the Mogul at Delhi. So nothing was left for our countrymen but fight; and as English fort after English fort was bravely defended, the natives began to respect the plucky strangers who knew so well to defend their own. Here and there native allies began to assist them in their fights, but it was a purely defensive business; they had no dreams of political influence or interference in the affairs of the country, and the most ambitious and far-seeing in the Anglo-Indian community of those days never dreamed that in these mushroom treaties with petty Rajahs, and in their tiny efforts at war, they were laying the foundations of an empire vaster than that of Akbar or Aurungzebe. They had no dreams of Eastern Empire. To the French is due this great conception. Dupleix, alike a genius and a patriot, had studied Indian history during his residence at the French settlements. He had observed that, from the time when Alexander the Great marched towards the sacred river down to the days of Timour and Akbar, India had always been conquered by the resolute invaders, and that the inhabitants, although skilled in arts and commerce, great and intelligent, had not that patriotism which enables a country to own itself; and he then formed the grand idea of subjecting India to French power, by the aid of disciplined native troops led by French officers; and with this force he hoped to add India to the French Crown, and substitute the cross for the crescent.

Dupleix was eminently successful in his plans. Ably seconded by De Bussy, he secured so much ascendancy at Delhi, both by his operations in war and his triumphs in diplomacy, as to nearly become the arbiter of the policy of the Mogul. With this power he threatened to extinguish the English settlements and influence at the same time. Their fate for a time hung in the balance, and in their despair they adopted the policy of their great rival; they engaged native troops; they became apt pupils in the wiles of political lying, and in a few short years all that power which Dupleix and De Bussy had, with so much courage and wisdom, built up was snatched forever from their grasp by the audacious genius of Clive. In, then, a hundred years from that time the great English Trading Company extended its power from the sea-washed Comorin to the snow-clad mountains of Thibet; it raised and deposed princes; it subverted ancient customs; it established new laws, and seemed at the height of its glory, with a long vista of dominion before it,—when it fell with a fearful calamity, which spread desolation through countless homes in England, and made the world stand aghast at the horrors of the catastrophe. A century of great deeds, great conquests, and great misrule was ended in the fearful convulsion of the Indian Mutiny.

With the military revolt came the end of the East India Company as a governing power. As such, it had but few merits; it taxed its subjects lightly, and paid its officials enormously; and when this is said its virtues have been described. Its light taxation was an accident and not a design. Down to 1813 it had the complete monopoly of the whole trade of the East, and up to 1833 the monopoly of the China trade. So long as these monopolies existed Indian finance was an easy task; but from that time to 1837 it ran heavily into debt. There never was such an experiment tried by any country in the world as the confiding the government of a vast empire to a commercial copartnership; and the wonder is, not that it did not do better, but that it did so well. Without a doubt the empire in India would never have been secured to England without the intervention of the East India Company. It was the buffer between the conscience of the English nation and many deeds of cruel wrong-doing and worse than bad faith. During years of incessant warfare, when the resources of England were taxed to the uttermost, the East India Company was the means of reserving a part of English wealth and strength for a specific purpose, which, if it had not existed, would have been sacrificed a thousand times for other ends. When Fox and North introduced their India bill it was to outbid the patronage of the Crown by the creation of numerous well-paid officers in India, which would then have brought India under English parliamentary control; and if George the Third, with an obstinacy as foolish as it was criminal, alienated this great land from England, yet in rejecting Fox and North's proposals, and in passing Pitt's India bill, he made the conquest of India possible, by shutting off Indian affairs from English considerations, leaving the East India Company to trade, to annex, and to misrule, so long as it cost the mother country neither men nor money. And as in your country it required the saddening war of a great rebellion to clear the land of the foul stain of slavery, it was only when the blood of helpless women and sucking children flowed, till strong men cried at the sickening butcheries, that England awoke to her danger and her duty, and the Queen, in her proclamation declaring herself the sovereign of India, announced that she was bound to the natives of her Empire in Asia by the same obligations which bound her to all her other subjects.

Never has such a conquest been effected within the limits of a century in the annals of the world; and now, from the lofty Himalayas, covered with stainless snow, across heated plains, over countless fields tilled by a teeming population, over mighty cities filled with wondrous and beautiful products of ingenious skill, over Hindu temples, marble mosques, and stately palaces of Mohammedan kings, down to the green slopes of Travancore,—over all these provinces, rich in men and material wealth, does England rule supreme over two hundred and eighty millions of human beings.

I wish I had time to glance at the fiery genius of Clive, at the cool and unscrupulous Bismarck-iron will of Hastings. I should have liked to pass rapidly in review the great and little wars which crowd the records of bloodshed and conquest for nearly the whole of the century; to have told you something of the closing days of the great company, with its last act of unjust annexation of Oude; and something of the terrible events of the Indian Mutiny of which I was a witness. But I must proceed. I wish to tell you how India is governed to-day,—to say something of the wants of its peoples, of the defects of its administration, to sketch a little of English social life in the East. England holds India, not for herself, but for India and for humanity. Linked as the history of India has often been with America, by ties and events which have produced the most momentous results, the condition of India and its government has peculiar claims on you; and peering, as I sometimes try to do, into the mysteries of the future, I oft think of the time when not the wild Atlantic nor the balmy ocean of the West will divide into fragments, great or little, the nations of our dear mother tongue, but that English and American, Australian and Celt, will yet be united in a commonwealth great and good, which will dictate laws of right to the world. And as the prosperity and greatness of your country should ever be the pride and prayer of every Englishman, the welfare of England, and the proper government of her mighty fief, should never be far from your thoughts.

I said that the English history in India and that of America were linked by strange ties; not stranger than by those which began here nearly a hundred years ago. When, in 1772, in consequence of needy wants, the East India Company obtained a loan of $7,500,000 from the English treasury, a severe parliamentary fight took place between the Whig peers and Commons as to the patronage conferred on the Crown. It was under this bill that Hastings became the first Governor-General in 1773. The act continued in force until 1781, when it was superseded, and most of its clauses swept away; but one clause will ever remain memorable in the common history of England and America,—a clause more pregnant with results than all the statutes enacted in the longest reign of any English king. In the financial duties the East India Company obtained a remission of the duty on tea imported in their vessels; besides this, the port duties of three pence on the pound, chargeable in the colonies, was declared to be repealed. The English Parliament took upon itself, as you all know, to confer this fiscal boon on your country. Lord Hillsborough fooled George the Third into the notion that by this plan he would entrap the Colonists, by the bait of a remitted duty, into acknowledging the right of taxation in a British parliament. Hillsborough and the king expected that if you would acquiesce in the power to remit taxes you could not very well refuse their power to impose fresh ones. But New Englanders were not likely to be fooled and beguiled by any such device; and to show you were in earnest you properly flung the untaxed tea into Boston harbor. You know what followed; and even in the events which led to your great rebellion may, I think, be traced the policy of the East India Company. There cannot be a doubt, whatever view may be taken as to the conduct of some English politicians in your late struggle, that the moral example which England gave to the world in the abolition of slavery in her colonies had a great effect in forming public opinion, and which spread and spread with ever-widening circle; and yet truth compels me to say that in my humble opinion English philanthropy has not nearly so much to do with bringing about the abolition of slavery in British dominions as the rise of the East Indian influence in England. West Indian interests had declared if slavery was only abolished in the West Indies (for field-slavery never existed in India), its abolition could only be a question of time in the Carolinas. With this would probably come a cessation of Southern industry, and East India cotton would then be king. The freeing of the slaves in Carolina took longer time than the monopolists in the East supposed; and when the glorious day arrived they had passed away with their mean and despicable policy. But the prosperity of India during the years of your war, when million after million was diverted from America to India, shows how well they gauged the course of events.

With the Queen's assumption of power in India has come an end of the unfeeling, selfish policy which dictated the ruthless acts of the old Company in defiance of all the laws of right; there has come a change for the better over the English policy in India, and the country is quiet; but there is no loyalty, nor is there any less dissatisfaction with foreign rule. Taxation is every year becoming more irksome; discontent is annually increasing. Lord Mayo, a few months before his death two years ago, wrote: "The continuance of this feeling of discontent is a political danger the magnitude of which can hardly be estimated; and any sentiment of dissatisfaction which existed among the disbanded soldiers of the native army is nothing in comparison to the discontent at present." "We can never depend a moment upon general tranquillity." Now why does discontent so increase? By law no privileges of race or creed are tolerated. All are equal before the law—Hindu, Mussulman, and Sahib; and yet the natives are not contented. One grave reason is the land question. In accordance with Asiatic ideas and immemorial custom, the Indian theory of the tenure of the soil vests in the absolute ownership of the sovereign. Hindu and Mohammedan rulers have always exercised the rights of proprietorship, and in many cases had exacted so large a portion of the produce as only to leave the farmer a bare subsistence; but the cultivator was never dispossessed of his cultivation rights to satisfy the obligations of the State, and even when the country was deserted and depopulated by war the right to cultivate the land remained to those who returned, or to those who survived. This policy has produced in India a greater love for land than in any other country of the world, and is at the root of the want of patriotism amongst the Hindus. They care but little who the owners of the soil are, so long as their rights are cared for and respected; and if this is done will calmly and stolidly bear many oppressions. Cornwallis, after his defeat here, was sent out to India as Governor-General. He went there imbued with strong aristocratic views—perhaps confirmed by the doings at Yorktown. At any rate, on his arrival in Bengal he upset all the ideas of centuries as regards the tenure of land, and, believing that the creation of a number of dependents on English rule would permanently secure their influence in Bengal, he introduced a system of land-holding unjust to the farmer, and which has certainly not been beneficial to the government. He granted the whole of the soil of Bengal to Zemindars, or land owners, who had no claims on it save the will of Cornwallis. He gave them lands varying from five square miles to many thousands, invested them with all the rights of English landlords; and the only claim the government had on them was the quit-rent, which Cornwallis fixed forever. The link which bound the cultivator with the ruler was rudely severed, and the Zemindars were speedily created to crush the humble Rajots. After a lapse of a century no result of English rule has given more deep-rooted dissatisfaction. Many of Cornwallis' Zemindars were speedily swept away by their imprudence and folly, and as their rights became confiscated from their failure to pay the annual quit-rent. The government are now nearly the largest Zemindar proprietor in Bengal, not exercising their rights under the old principles of Asiatic rule, but under the rights they themselves conveyed to the Zemindars and then resumed; and as the first consideration in India is ever the revenue, the last rights of the Rajots, the result is lamentable; and it is very sad for me to confess that the poorest parts of India are for the most part those which have been longest under English rule, the richest those which have been most lately acquired. Fortunately Lord Cornwallis' settlement, as it is called, did not extend beyond Bengal; in Madras and in Bombay they have the Rejotasee system, or the village-renting system. Either the whole community rent the land, or each individual yet pays his assessment on his field direct to the revenue officer who collects it. In Bombay they have a most elaborate system of land-assessment. Every field is mapped and distinguished by permanent boundary stones, the soil and climate classed; and year by year the Rejot pays on the amount he cultivates and the grain he raises; but they cannot be dispossessed from their fields as in Bengal. They have all the advantages of a perpetual lease, with no disadvantages. In Bengal the Rejot lives in the most abject poverty. The only clothing he has is the cotton rag round his loins. The demands on his little ready money are endless, and this ever prevents him saving the small sum necessary to get out of debt. He lives under one of the most tyrannical of usury systems. In the district where indigo is grown, the Rejot is really only the serf to the planter, who leases his land, often his factory, from some private Zemindar, or from the government in the exercise of Zemindar rights. Although Bengal is noted for the fertility of its soil, producing with water three to four crops of rice per annum, the Rejot's condition is miserable. He very seldom spends in any month more than $1.50. There is not five per cent. of them whose annual earning is over $50. It is really no exaggeration to say that in ordinary seasons the Rejot fasts, from literal want of food, many days during the year; when in famine times they perish by thousands. The revenue which the Indian government derives from the land-tax is over $105,000,000 per annum. During the whole period of English rule there have been innumerable plans how to increase this huge sum, but little has been done to enable the people to pay it. If the Rejots were able to pay the land-tax, it would be a matter of very secondary importance how it was collected; but they are not, and why is it so? Millions have been spent freely on barracks, on official residences, on military roads and bridges, whilst canals, the life-blood of an Eastern country like India, have been neglected.

The famine which has now passed away has cost the Indian government and people $50,000,000. Had this sum been spent in irrigation given before it would have probably been prevented, and the lives of the people not imperilled. In many districts the people live continually on the verge of famine and death. The old public native works show that the native rulers had an idea that there was something more important than revenue; and if England wishes to gain the moral applause and sympathies of the world, her primary duty is to remove the dangers under which so many of her subjects dwell, and by well-directed schemes of irrigation remove the perils of famine from the land. The English government, having assumed the position of landlord in India, has duties and responsibilities which are unknown in England or America to the governing power. The Indian government certainly behaved with commendable energy in the late famine; but what did England do? Permitted India to borrow $50,000,000 to feed her starving, dying people, who have to pay the interest on this generous contribution of English capitalists forever! Can the mockery of assistance go further? Our land-policy has alienated the Rejot from English rule. Attachment to the soil is the strong point of Hindu village-life. Make the Rejots feel that they are regarded as something more than mere revenue-raising machines; place them above famine, and then they will begin to appreciate the virtues of English rule.

Another grave reason for the discontent of the native is the administration of justice. "One magistrate may be better than a regiment of soldiers, and a good law better than a brigade." These are the words of Sir Henry Laurence, and no man knew the native mind more thoroughly. In fact, nothing is so clearly established as that the system of the administration of justice has been a complete failure. The state of the laws and of the law-courts has been and is a crying reproach to England, and a grievous sin to India. Judges without legal education, subordinates steeped in corruption, a code of procedure oppressive and costly, incapacity on the bench, plunder by the clerks, delay and confusion everywhere, must be the verdict on the legal and judicial department of English rule in India by those who have seen it.

Such a state of affairs has produced in many places a dislike of all courts, and a consequent disregard of law. Eager for innovation, and blinded by admiration for English institutions, there was introduced into India a uniform and complex system of laws utterly unsuited to the habits, feelings, and genius of the people. In criminal law especially does this system break down. Under native rulers a criminal was rarely imprisoned before being tried. He was tried as soon as apprehended, and acquitted or punished without delay; but now, under the protection of the law, he tells lies with impunity. Time is given to bring up witnesses who will swear to anything, and as the natural law of supply and demand governs this class of professional evidence, from this arises a vast amount of perjury and moral depravity. In the well-governed native States, there are no courts of law, but justice costs little, is done quickly, and at every man's door. When an injury is done, either criminal or civil, as soon as the potail, or head man of the village, is informed of the crime or of the complaint, he orders the Punchayat, a court composed of five respectable villagers, to assemble, by whom investigation is made, and redress given on the spot. This Punchayat is beyond doubt regarded by the natives as the magna charter of the millions. In this court there is no evidence of inferiority of race exhibited as in other courts, by suitors walking bare-foot whilst the high-salaried judge is administering law with his boots on the table of the cutcherry or court-hall. There is no English law to mystify the natives, no calling of foul names by corrupt interpreters, no Black Bumbles to descant on the exertions, and to flatter the doings, of the Burra Sahib, or great master, on the bench; but there they are judges of their own kith and kin, who know the character and language of all before them, and who administer justice on principles which have been recognized as equity for hundreds of years by these simple villagers. Until these courts are again reestablished, until the heads of villages are invested with the authority they had before our rule under all dynasties, the English will ever be to the Hindu a hard and alien master; they will ever remain estranged in their feelings and distinct in their interests from their conquerors. The civil code, the penal code, are triumphs of legal skill and lore, but they are unsuited to the actual wants of India; and if England is desirous of doing justice to India, giving to her subjects such laws as they would make for themselves if independent, there must be a discarding of complex procedure and new-fangled codes, and a return to the summary modes and simple laws of the Hindu and Mussulman. There might at first be an abuse of authority on the part of these reconstructed tribunals, but its exercise would speedily create the remedy for such abuse in a thousand ways.

Another still graver reason for dissatisfaction is the exclusiveness of English rule. In this respect it differs from that of any previous conqueror. The real estrangement between the dominant and subject races increases every year. In the early days of the Company the want of intercourse with England, and the absence of female society, led to the establishment of social relations with the natives, and to the adoption in many cases of their habits. It was then considered no discredit to contract ties with native women which the customs and laws of the country did not condemn as either illegal or immoral. Such ties were not connected with women of mean condition or of doubtful character. On the contrary alliances were formed between British officers and civilians and some of the proudest families of Hindostan. The Indian official would then take part in village rejoicings, would lend his horses and elephants to swell their marriage processions, and was frequently an honored guest at their feasts. But all this is changed. There is certainly a more open profession of Christianity and Christian morals, although I am afraid the tone of private morality is not much improved. No alliance, either morganatic or otherwise, is now considered respectable with natives, and a connecting link between the governed and the governors has passed away. The position of the civil servant (as it is called) is very different from what it was thirty or forty years ago. Then they went to India to spend their lives; they were wont then to wander through their districts, pitching their tents in some shady grove, and spending their time with native chiefs, listening to complaints and dispensing justice the natives were accustomed to, and giving sympathy and encouragement to all.

Now under the new bureaucratic system, the civilian seldom leaves his cutcherry; nearly all his intercourse is conducted through subordinates often corrupt and venal. He feels that at headquarters he is judged, not so much by the condition of his district, as by the amount of revenue he collects, and the number of reports he sends off. Can you wonder, then, with so little sympathy between English and Hindu, that they have no common interests, and as education is daily spreading, the danger which this estrangement leads to is daily increasing? Reflecting men and highly-trained are daily gathering in Indian cities, and increasing day by day in numbers and influence. The lessons they receive in philosophy and science soon destroy any remnants of belief in their own religion, and that faith is certainly replaced with no other. Christianity, whether Orthodox or Catholic, is making no progress amongst the educated classes in India. And with this comes a desire for a return to native rule; not a native rule such as it often was. Their aspirations picture the same order and security which are enjoyed now enforced by British bayonets, and the substitution of themselves as rulers of the land, instead of the arrogant and, to them, unsympathetic Englishmen.

Education is spreading to a certain extent in India amongst the masses. We have 40,000 schools teaching 1,223,000 scholars, all boys; and we have in the whole of India 1,640 girl schools, where 57,000 girls are receiving some sort of education; and if I were asked what was the most beneficent result of English rule I would answer: The intellectual movement which is certainly going on in educated Hindu life. In the large cities there are people's associations, radical leagues, and in Lucknow a radical club; all bona fide Hindu. In fact, in most of the larger towns of India there is an undoubted awakening of thought amongst the natives. Books are being published in large numbers, the greater part of them on religion, and the native press all over India discusses every matter before them with the utmost freedom of opinion and language.

You would have a very inadequate notion of the English in India if I did not say something as to how the government is carried on, and by what means, in spite of discontent amounting at times to smothered rebellion, England holds in quiet subjection so vast an empire. The civil administration is carried on by eight hundred Englishmen, who form what is called the Covenanted Service. They secure their first appointments by competition, and their salaries vary from $1,500 at commencement to $40,000 per annum. All subjects to the Queen can compete for these appointments; but as yet no Hindu has secured a place. In consequence of local regulations, they may retire, after twenty-one years' service, on a retiring allowance of $5,000 per annum. Besides this Covenanted Service there are 4,000 Englishmen and Eurasians, and 2,200 natives in the Covenanted Service, who receive their nominations after competition from the Governor-General and the governors of the minor presidencies. Their salaries vary very much, and run up as high as $15,000 per annum; but no natives receive more than $9,000. Besides this force of 7,000 in the civil employ, the army consists of 70,000 English soldiers, and 140,000 native troops. Besides these to keep the peace, there are about 50,000 military police, well armed and drilled, and to all intents and purposes soldiers. The English officers in charge of the army and police number 6,000; 10,000 troops are kept in the depots of England to supply the wants of India. I need not to say that the expense of these troops is paid by India. The revenues of India amount to $250,000,000 per annum. The land-tax I described amounts to about one-half. Next in importance come two taxes which strangely illustrate the policy of the Anglo-Indian government, and the poor condition of India,—the opium monopoly yielding $47,000,000, and the tax on salt, $28,000,000. The cultivation of the poppy is prohibited in Bengal, save for the purpose of selling the juice to the government at a fixed price; it is manufactured into opium at the official factories, and sold by the government; it is exported to China to demoralize that nation; but so profitable is this imperial trade that it yields the sum I have just named.

The salt-tax presses heavily on the wretched rejt; the tax is equal to eight per cent. in Bengal, and half that amount in the other parts of India, and, from his earnings being so small, a family's consumption of salt amounts to an income-tax of one-twelfth of his income ($7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent). In spite of this large sum raised annually from the poorest people on the face of the earth, the problem with the Indian government is how to make both ends meet financially (they have not as yet proposed inflating the currency however); and until the English Parliament comes forward and adopts the debt of India as the debt of England, and so enables the Indian authorities to borrow money for the internal improvement of the country at the same low rate of interest as England can borrow, India must ever remain the land of impossible taxation and yearly deficits. Our system cannot work much longer, and, with the increasing public debt of India, contracted in a great measure to secure English ascendancy, I think the time has come when if England is to be just she must share the burdens of India.

As a triumph of arms any Englishman may well be proud, but it brings the blush to the cheek of every right-conscience man when he thinks of the means employed to bring our military power into action. And yet it was a country worth conquering. When I come to think of the value of India to England, how much India is contributing to the wealth and power of England, how much the prosperity and greatness of Great Britain are bound up in her gigantic Indian territory,—it is when I think of these things, that the "English in India" comes home to every English-speaking country as a weighty problem. The commerce of England with India is greater than with any other country save your own. The great bulk of the middle classes in England is supported from revenues derived from India, in one form or another. To give you some idea of the amount of money spent in England from the Indian revenue, I have looked at the latest parliamentary return, and find $55,000,000 per annum, to say nothing of the vast sums spent in the education of Anglo-Indian families, and officers on furlough, which are certainly no less direct contributions from India to England. London is even adorned at the expense of Indian rejtots, the handsome buildings for the government of India being erected at the expense of the Indian Budget. A splendid army of 70,000 men is trained, paid, and kept in active discipline at the cost of India, but for the use of England. India has been a cheap training-school for her soldiers—a whetstone for their valor for the last century.

I may here add that no direct payment or tribute is paid by India to England; but if these are a few of the benefits India confers upon England, what does India get in return? No doubt, since 1858 internal and external peace has been secured. Thug-gism and suttee worship have been put down, infanticide is reduced to a minimum, and human sacrifices are scarce. An attempt has certainly been made to give a pure administration of laws, bad laws unsuited to her people. Roads, bridges, railroads, and telegraphs have been constructed, wherever thought necessary, for military and strategic purposes, and, as I said, education has been diffused to some extent among the masses. A semblance of a Parliament has been established in the three presidency towns, but it is not an elective body and every member is either the nominee of the Crown or of its nominee, the local governor. In a word, the change from the Company to the Crown has been, to a certain extent, disadvantageous. There is now no despotism more complete than the Secretary of State of India. Theoretically, he is under the control of Parliament, but practically he does what he pleases. A debate on the condition of India will hardly secure the attendance of twenty members of Parliament, and the reason is obvious: The masses of the people are brought into no sort of union with Indian policy; they hear many people who have been in India speak of the natives of the country as a people destitute of every feeling, and wholly addicted to falsehood and vice and what they call treason. So long as this continues, there can be no proper English government to India, no real cordiality between the races. Now I know something of India; for years I lived in it, and travelled, and I do not believe that there is a people in the world so quick to perceive, and so ready to admit, eminence of any kind as the Hindu.

With a mind logical they sternly apply facts to real life. They admit English intellectual ability and physical courage, but they cannot forget their own national history; they have a country which has produced kings, soldiers, statesmen, poets, and philosophers, inhabited by nations acute and intelligent; they know they have been conquered many times, yet from the days of the Greek invasion of Alexander down to the Mohammedan dynasties these countrymen had a fair share of the government of their country; they perceive that English rule differs from all that has come and gone. They are practically excluded from every position of trust and responsibility, and they are looked upon, from the highest to the lowest with few exceptions, as incompetent for any but the most menial occupations; and men who but for Englishmen would be governors of provinces and commanders of armies are supposed to be highly honored if permitted to sit in the presence of a British ensign. They cannot help observing that the Englishman holds himself aloof from the natives, rejects all social intercourse with them as derogatory to his dignity, and gives them the smallest share in the government of his own lands.

During the Mohammedan era Mohammedan princes had Hindu ministers, and Hindu rulers Mohammedan advisers; but England only governs through Englishmen. Now this will not do. If England is to be a benefit to India she must admit the natives of India to the highest offices in the government of the country they can fill. She must create common sympathies between the rulers and the ruled. She must show the government is more careful of the rights of the people than was that of the old native princes and Mohammedan emperors. She must administer speedy justice according to Oriental ideas of right and wrong. She must give her subjects the means of raising themselves to the highest posts of dignity and power by education diffused everywhere. She must admit them to places of trust, and give them an equal participation in the management of the country. If the mission of England in India is to sow the seeds of order and good government, to watch over them and to maintain them until they have gained sufficient strength to flourish alone, to be the means of giving to the East the elevating influences of the West,—influences which only need rekindling in their parent home,—it will not be done by merely making roads, railroads, telegraphs, and bridges, exhibiting mere industrial excellences before the eyes of India. The spectators soon weary of an exhibition in which they take no part; and in these matters the natives resent this assumption of superiority in material arts. England must do more than this. She must associate the people in the work of government before they can acquire that training which will ever fit them for self-rule; and justice and self-interest alike demand this; for if England wishes to retain her hold on India (and I hope and believe that for the sake of humanity she will), she must govern it on those principles which distinguish true freedom everywhere. India must no longer be treated as a conquered country; it must be considered an integral part of the British dominion, with all the privileges of home-rule in its truest and best sense; and to its hold on the affections of its inhabitants must it look for the stability and permanence of its sovereignty.

I do not know that I can conclude this lecture in better words than those of one of the wisest and best of English statesmen: "The world is governed by an inevitable power which giveth and taketh away dominion; and vain would be the impotent prudence of man against the operations of its almighty influence. All that rulers can do is to merit dominion by promoting the happiness of those under them; and if we perform our duty in this respect, the gratitude of India and the admiration of the world will accompany our name through all ages, whatever may be the revelations of futurity; but if we withhold blessings from our subjects from a selfish apprehension of possible dangers at a remote period, we shall not deserve to keep dominion. We shall merit that reverse which time has possibly in store for us, and shall fall with the mingled hatred and contempt, the hisses and execrations, of mankind."

[FOR THE INDEX.]

"DRESS REFORM."

MR. EDITOR:—

Among the literary notices in THE INDEX of Jan. 7 appears a long and enthusiastic review of the book lately issued, called Dress Reform.

Admitting that it is "a summing up of the wisest things that have been said upon the subject of dress reform"—also that those interested in its production and the propagating of its principles are most sincere,—I must beg of you to allow me space to suggest a few ideas contrary and inimical to those which the writer closes by saying, "Corsets are doomed to everlasting oblivion, and woman's body is approaching its day of freedom."

I wish to grant to all the right to express and maintain their opinions, demanding for myself and others a similar privilege; and when we undertake as conscientiously to disprove some of these principles, we do not quite fancy being placed so low in the scale of intelligence, or considered too frivolous, to be able to judge from our own stand-point and experiences of what will suit us best, physiologists, reforms, and so forth, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Let us take the remark that "Men do not read the book, but they read women who have read it, and get their opinion of its worth from them. They rise and fall in their estimate according as the wife and daughter at home render their verdict. One can easily guess the tightness of a woman's corset in these days by asking her husband what he thinks of the dress reform," etc., etc.

This surely is giving men a high position for independence of opinion; originality of thought and action. My experience has been quite different, I finding most men decriing corsets, and justly, because—they are improperly made and worn, and women do suffer from the abuse and not the use; but men do not accept the proposed change, because a trimly, neatly-fitted woman is more gratifying to the eye than one in the loose dress, suggestive of morning negligé, and for which I cannot see the necessity. I repeat now what I have said before: proper use and not abuse is to be desired in everything.

I have shown women how to buy and wear corsets without discomfort, I think even without possible injury, receiving the thanks and approval of their husbands and friends. The corset should be as carefully fitted as the dress,—a fact which few women know, purchasing a corset of as many inches at waist as they suppose they require, leaving the rest to fit or not as chance may provide, they supposing all has been done that can be.

Periodically, without attempting to ascertain the exact cause of difficulty, there has been a war against the corset, resulting in its disuse for a time, to be again as eagerly recommended by the very physicians who urged its abolition, because greater evils arose; and of the two the corset was the lesser.

At the time of Napoleon I., for about ten years, corsets were not used, and the results, according to the accounts of many physicians, were disastrous; spinal diseases became frequent, and stooping figures and uneven shoulders prevailed. The utter, sudden disuse of the corset was thought to have a bad effect on the health of women, and it was again resumed.

Is it not a little singular that it should have been left for women physiologists and physicians alone to insist upon and emphatically settle the hitherto doubtful point as to what really does the injury?

Eminent male physiologists and physicians, with quite equal advantages for research, investigation, and observation among their female patients and otherwise, disagree most emphatically with these ladies. Are not their opinions worthy of some consideration and respect? Shall they not be weighed in the balance? Mrs. Jane G. Swisshelm some time since wrote an article headed "The Ignorant Man who Rescued Corsets," full of sarcasm against two articles written some four years since for the Galaxy, which she attributes to William Draper. One article, written by John C. Draper, may be found in the May number of the Galaxy, 1870, entitled "Nature and Dress," the only one I have been able to find.

I would recommend it to the consideration of all who are not already fixed in their opinions for or against the corset and a certain proportion of weight at the hips. For those who may not care to seek the article in its entirety, I will give some quotations.

Speaking of the classic dress, the shoulders carrying only the weight of the clothing that descended to the waist, the writer says: "As a consequence, the human form reached a high degree of perfection, if we may judge from the statues that have been preserved from those times, and of which the Venus of Milo, so generally spoken of in works on physiology, is an example. In this connection we would respectfully call the attention of the modern Amazons to their earlier namesakes, who, though they also wore trousers, still retained a sufficient regard for their physical development to avoid strapping down their shoulders." Again: "In the East, the heaviest part of the dress of both sexes has been similar, from time immemorial, to the modern trousers, made very loose, suspended from the hips by a girdle, and fastened around the ankle. In this costume the upper part of the body is covered by a short, loose jacket, thus forming a dress which, though it differs in appearance from the classic, agrees with it in giving great freedom of motion to the upper extremities, and throws the weight chiefly on the hips. In our own time, these early costumes are still worn; and artists tell us that, if we would see the human form in its perfection, we must seek for it where they are retained, and not among those whose chests are strapped down and deformed by the so-called suspenders. In the physiological discussion of the relative merits of suspenders and girdles or corsets, it is necessary to pay due regard to sex; and in obedience to the dictates of polite custom we may first examine into the physiological necessities of dress in woman. By virtue of her relations to the function of reproduction, woman is so constructed that the hips are much broader than in man," etc., etc. Further on he writes: "The use of the skirt being premised and granted, shall it be suspended from the hips or shoulders? Our opinion is, from the hips most decidedly, and for the following reasons: In woman, respiration is accomplished chiefly, and, in certain conditions entirely, by the elevation and expansion of the upper part of the chest. To use a medical phrase, it is thoracic, and not abdominal, as in man. Even the clothing about the upper part of the chest should rest as lightly as possible on the shoulders, and all strapping down should be discarded. Another objection to the use of straps is their tendency to interfere with the breasts; and in view of the sensitiveness of these organs it would appear to be wise to arrange the clothing to support them, rather than to press them down."

I believe Mrs. Swisshelm has invented something which she considers a benefit to her sex, and which doubtless is for many; yet is it not uncalled-for to denounce a man as ignorant who seems to comprehend the subject, and give sufficient reason for his opinions, and who is apparently quite the reverse of ignorant?

Laborers throw off their suspenders and tighten their belts for service. Gymnasts, pugilists, boys running races, soldiers, all tighten their belts; and I have been told recently that the belt which was discarded in the army is now replaced by a wider one, fastened tightly for a march. These things mean something, and are the effects of a cause.

Draper says: "Is it not probable that the failure to throw the weight of a part of the garments on the hips, and the persistent use of suspenders, has been a powerful agent in the production of the narrow chests we so commonly see, and which present the shape that would be produced by a weight continually dragging on the upper part of the chest; just as in some savage tribes the head is compressed into a certain form by strapping it down with bands and boards?"

Dr. Mary Safford Blake did not find the German women who wore no corsets in the state of perfection she anticipated. Heavy skirts had to assume that responsibility.

If they had worn corsets, the heavy skirts could not have so injured them. If we are to rebel against the "six to ten thicknesses" about the thoracic region and but one at the feet as so injurious (and, by the way, I take exception to that, because we have two, the warm stocking and, thanks to agitation and denunciation, shoes equal to several of the thoracic thicknesses), why not reform the men's as well as women's dress in this particular? Men are similarly clad in this respect, and I think few of us would care to be clothed to the extremities as we are at the trunk of the body. Am I not correct in supposing that, if we protect these vital organs properly, they will supply the extremities properly? Will all the covering in the world produce warm feet, other conditions being unfavorable?

I regret, on the part of myriads of sensible women, the assertion that "a woman might know her heart was being squeezed up into her mouth and her lungs down into her boots, and she would not forsake her idol." You, who are so earnest, will you not be a little more just and generous, allowing for differences of temperaments and requirements, and equal sincerity of conviction—hoping your right ideas will prevail? I have made it my business to investigate each side, seeking the opinions of physicians and others, men and women, for and against.

The abuse of the corset few will ignore; but I believe a vote would place the majority of learned, conscientious, intelligent, and truth-seeking men and women in favor of its use rather than its disuse.

"There is a class of critics of this dress reform whose corseted appearance renders it easy to conjecture that an autopsy in their case might reveal some displacement of organs," etc., etc. How many autopsies are there of men or women that reveal perfect organisms?

Again we are brought to this never-ceasing admiration of the Greek women, clad in their graceful draperies, flowing from the shoulders, etc.

The object now aimed at, I believe, is to render our dress more healthful, sensible, and practical, that we may be better fitted to perform our daily duties as well as adorn our homes and the social circle.

This beautiful, apparently simple Greek dress was worn only by women of rank, its sweeping, clinging folds rendering it impossible for them to perform any labor, keeping them within doors, requiring slaves to attend them, and so on. The toilette was an affair of some hours' duration, with slaves for every department to perfect it; and the draping of these very garments, so simple, depended upon the skill of an especial attendant, and woe be unto her if she failed to meet the requirements of her fickle and capricious mistress! Added to this, beneath these flowing draperies, was worn a ceinture; nothing more nor less than a short corset. The girdle supported the weight of the garments at the hips, the shoulders bearing but slight weight.

"The drapery of the Greek sculptors was founded on artistic ideas and principles, not on those of practical utility; while the every-day dress, beautiful and simple though it always remained, was conformed to the protection and comfort of the body as well as the convenience of the wearer." This every-day dress is not the dress suggested to most minds by the Greek dress; it was short and scanty, and I hardly think would find favor even with the dress reformers. It was worn by the slaves and working classes.

Mrs. Woolson suggests one idea with reference to the ancient corset which strikes me as strange. She states that the old-fashioned corset, which bore no resemblance to the shape of our bodies, compressing and depressing, was preferable to the modern, which so closely resembles the form; because this prevents ventilation, and that from its misfit allowed it.

The corsets, till modified, gave neither ventilation nor breathing room, causing frightful ills. To-day our corsets give every opportunity for ventilation except just at the belt and hips, where they resist the pressure of the clothing. Query: Which does greater injury, compression of the whole trunk, or lack of ventilation?

Being a "corseted critic," yet not a wearer of this destructive article till over sixteen years of age, then strong and hearty, now able to endure more than the average of women, with the necessity oftentimes, in pursuance of my business duties, of going up and down from sixteen to twenty flights of stairs, three or four days in the week, during several successive months—not being conscious of the weight of skirts, but able to sew all day long, continuously, without back-ache or side-ache, wear a corset without hindrance or inconvenience, and having, despite the wearing of it, gained proportionately in waist as I have in breadth, I must give my voice in favor of the general use of properly-woven, properly-fitted, judiciously-worn corsets.

Many women should not wear them, and hosts should wear them differently. Where I consider them injurious, I urge upon the wearer to discard them, taking pleasure in recommending "dress reform."

As to the fashion of Mrs. Woolson's garments, I have nothing to say, as I urge upon all women the following of their individual tastes and fancies, suggesting an approach to a prevailing mode, but not a blind adoption of one fashion for all forms, faces, and characters.

From a Catholic paper, I take the following from an article entitled "What is a Chemiloon?" With quotations from ladies' letters, it says: "What in the world is it? Is there any man on the Catholic press bold enough to ask the question of his wife?"

I think a prettier and more attractive name might have been given to this article of feminine apparel, which would have made it more poetical to read and speak of. I am not going to tell what it is, because men have no curiosity, and women can find out.

One great fact has been accomplished by this discussion of dress reform; namely, really practical inventions for discarding the corset, supporting the clothing from the shoulders without suspenders and the consequent danger from pressure upon the breast. I allude to Mrs. Olivia P. Flynt's patents, which, to my mind, combine most practically all that can be desired for those who wish to make this change. With others, I protest against bearing the weight of clothing upon my shoulders, they being less able to bear it than the hips; but I heartily recommend to all who are suffering, and feel it to be a needed change, to adopt this style of dress.

To pursue too fiercely one hobby shows a lack of balance. To attribute all ills to one article or style of dress is a mistake.

Our feet must bear their share of blame, because they do not bear their share of burden. Shoes should be made for and fitted to every individual, with the modern improvements added. (I have had my boots made for me by one man in Baltimore for nearly thirty years, and his make and shape are so excellent that he is not obliged to adopt modern improvements.) Here the boots are made and the feet fitted to the boots, not vice versa, as should be. How many ladies can either buy, or have made for them, a pair of boots which shall so perfectly fit them that they can wear them with the same ease as an old pair? This can be, should be, the case; and with beauty combined with comfort. Reform shoe-making and cutting.

The parties attended by our daughters, with continued dancing until the wee, small hours of the morning, late suppers, and badly ventilated rooms,—are there no disarrangements consequent upon these?

Our young mothers being injudicious before the birth of their children and incautious from ignorance afterwards,—shall we not be just, and attribute the resulting injuries to many other injurious causes as well as to the corset?

With no personal interest for or against, with independence to carry out for myself my ideas of right, with a certain degree of practical knowledge and quite an extended experience, I cannot remain silent and forbear to make an effort to place this matter in its true light.

Our dress affects our health; our health affects our homes; our homes affect our children (to whom we must look for future progress) for good or evil. There is much that is desirable in this dress reform; but it is not absolute, and must not be so ranked.

WENDELL PHILLIPS' LETTER.

BOSTON, 22d July, 1874.

TO G. J. HOLYOAKE:

My dear Sir,—I ought long ago to have thanked you for sending me copies of your pamphlets, and with so kind and partial a recognition of my co-operation with you in your great cause. That on Mill was due certainly to a just estimate of him, but how sad that human jackals should make it necessary. Those on co-operation I read again and again, welcoming the light you throw on it, for it is one of my most hopeful stepping-stones to a higher future. Thank you for the lesson; it cleared one or two dark places—not the first I owe you, by any means, for I've read everything of yours I could lay my hands on. There was one small volume on rhetoric, "Methods of address, hints towards effective speech, etc.," which I studied faithfully, until some one to whom I had praised it and loaned it, acting probably on something like Coleridge's rule, that books belong to those who most need them, never returned me my well-thumbed essay, to my keen regret. Probably you never knew that we pirated your book. This was an American reprint, wholly exhausted—proof that it did good service. We reprinted, some ten years ago, one of your wisest tracts, "The Difficulties that Obstruct Co-operation." It did us yeomanly service.

I wish I could have an hour's talk with you on this labor and capital question; one, perhaps, to have as angry an agitation as slavery caused. Wealth, with you, governs; but its power is, I suppose, somewhat masked, sometimes countervailed or checked by other forces. With us it rules, bare, naked, shameless, undisguised. Our incorporated wealth, often wielded by a single hand, is fearful with direct, and still more with indirect, power. We have single men who wield $400,000,000, so shaped that towns, counties, States, are its vassals. Two or three united railways (one president) will subject a State to their will. Vanderbilt is reported to say, "It is cheaper and surer to buy legislatures than voters." This is the peril of universal suffrage. Then rum rule sours great cities whenever it chooses to exert its power. The sadness of the whole thing is, one hardly sees whence the cure is to come. I believe, I don't see. Truly our movements demand a most patient faith. I never expected to see any success of our antislavery struggle. Fortified in Church, State, and capital, the system would have outlived this generation, and, perhaps, the next, with ordinary shrewdness on the part of its friends. The gods made them mad on their way to destruction, and so hastened it. Neither shall I live long enough to see any marked result of our labor movement here, though it is true that our masses ripen marvellously quick; but, as you've said, the cliques, jealousies, distrust, and ignorance of workmen are our chief obstacles. Indeed, we sometimes get better help from open-hearted capitalists. Your ranks are infinitely better trained than ours to stand together on some one demand just long enough to be counted, and so insure that respect which numbers always command in politics, where universal suffrage obtains. Then we'd have all the brains of the land our servants, and soon gain that attention which is here half of success. But I suppose all this is familiar to you, as well as the strength we expect from related questions—finances, mode of taxation, land tenure, etc. There'll never be, I believe and trust, a class party here, labor against capital; the lines are so indefinite, like dove's neck colors. Three-fourths of our population are to some extent capitalists, and again all see that there is really and ought always to be alliance, not struggle, between them. So we lean chiefly on related questions for growth; limitation of hours is almost the only special measure. But enough. I shall beg you to accept a volume of old speeches, printed long ago, because it includes my only attempt to criticise you, which you probably never saw. I will put, when I mail it, the last and best photograph of Sumner, and, if you exchange, I will add one of

Yours, faithfully and ever, WENDELL PHILLIPS.

GUIZOT prefaced his will by a declaration of his faith, which reads as follows: "I die in the bosom of the Reformed Christian Church of France, in which I was born, and in which I congratulate myself on having been born. In remaining always connected with her I exercised the liberty of conscience which she allows her members in their relations with God, and which she herself invoked in establishing herself. I examined, I doubted, I believed that the strength of the human mind was sufficient to solve the problems presented by the universe and man, and that the strength of the human will was sufficient to regulate man's life according to its law and its moral end. After having long lived, acted, and reflected, I remained and still remain convinced that the universe and man are neither of them sufficient to explain and regulate themselves naturally by the mere force of fixed laws which preside over them, and of the human wills which are brought into play. It is my profound belief that God, who created the universe and man; governs and preserves or modifies them whether by those general laws which we call natural laws, whether by special acts which we call supernatural emanations, like the general laws, from his perfect and free wisdom and from his infinite power, which he has enabled us to recognize in their effects, and forbids us from being acquainted with in their essence and design. I thus returned to the convictions in which I was cradled, always firmly attached to the person and liberty which I have received from God, and which are my honor as well as my right on the earth, but again feeling myself a child in God's hands, and sincerely resigned to so large a share of ignorance and weakness. I believe in God, and adore him without attempting to comprehend him. I see him present and acting not only in the permanent government of the universe and in the innermost life of men's souls, but in the history of human societies especially in the Old and New Testaments—monuments of the Divine revelation and action by the mediation and sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ, for the salvation of the human race. I bow before the mysteries of the Bible and the gospel, and I hold aloof from scientific discussion and solutions by which men have attempted to explain them. I trust that God permits me to call myself a Christian, and I am convinced that in the light which I am about to enter we shall fully discern the purely human origin and vanity of most of our dissensions here below on divine things."

CENTENNIAL HYMN.

BY SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Columbia! shrine of our hope!
'Tis thine to wake prophetic cheer,
'Tis thine to show the better way;
Unwavering still our trust in thee,—
Thou art our stay!

A century since did thy great heart,
Inspired, write on our Western sky
Its blazing faith—hymn we yet sing:
"The people strong, the people free,
Nor craft of king!"

'Twas nobly done; yet fate hath bonds,
Doth yet our lives enthrall, and yet
Cry we aloud, "Unbind the 'free';
Still are we slaves while we obey
The 'Powers that be.'"

Free citizens, true noblemen,
Pledge not themselves as powerful State
And frame the lower law of Force;
They pledge themselves from outward law
To win divorce.

In freedom each shall seek his own;
In freedom each the other serve;
In thy command—a luring voice
Persuasive in its every tone—
Let all rejoice.

Fair Freedom shall our goddess be;
In Force we no more refuge find:
Best law of Nature, Confidence!
We summon thee; bequeath our land
Thy high defence.

O land pulsate with Freedom's life!
Thy mission bold proclaim anew.
Disarm. Bring Freedom's peace. Unmake
Thy statute rules. Thy Equity
Let all partake.

The Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 28, 1875.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 1, TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

SUNDAY LECTURES.—The Editors of THE INDEX will lecture occasionally on Sundays, if desired, within a convenient distance of Boston.

THE Liberal Worker, published in Sharon, Wisconsin, says: "A writer in THE INDEX wants to know if Liberals are liberal. We have found many of them very liberal with their opinions, but very illiberal with their money. Many others are liberal in that their beliefs are very broad, but illiberal in that they will tolerate no one who does not think with them."

THERE is no little brain in the London National Reformer, Charles Bradlaugh's paper. One of its recent bright paragraphs is as follows: "The civil, or rather the uncivil, war between the factions in the Church of England is becoming so fierce that even bishops foresee a schism as 'humanly' inevitable; and if it is inevitable humanly, I fear that the divine element will not do much to prevent it. The three principal parties of High Church, Broad Church, and Low Church, were long since excellently defined as Attitudinarian, Latitudinarian, and Plitudinarian. At present Latitude and Platitude are making a desperate assault on Attitude. Last week a great meeting of the Church Association was held in Willis' Rooms; and the Hour devotes more than a page of small print to the letters and speeches. One of the letters gives the noble war-cry of the Association: 'No Concession, No Compromise, No Surrender about the Eastward Position and the Distinctive Vestments!'—to which couple of notes of exclamation, we cool outsiders are not disinclined to add half a dozen of our own."

THIS is what the Independent juicily says about it: "Somebody—Edward Everett Hale, perhaps—attempts in the Christian Union to tell what is 'Unitarianism, its Present Beliefs and Purposes.' If the attempt raises a smile, it must be pardoned. A little joke comes in when for 'Unitarianism' the writer artlessly substitutes 'Christian Unitarianism,' leaving a sharp reader to ask: 'But what about Unchristian Unitarianism?' What is the belief of a portion of Christian Unitarianism is very well told. Such Unitarians believe in Christ, 'if' belief means 'discipleship,' and 'casting out devils,' and the seeing in him the commissioned Son of God; not God. This 'casting out devils' is rhetorical enough, but that has always been a vice of Unitarian dogmatics. The writer goes on to describe Unitarianism as teaching that human nature is not wholly depraved, but has 'a possibility of holiness in every soul,' in which sense it certainly is not wholly depraved, if it be such in any proper sense of the words. He continues that Bushnell's view of the atonement has ever been the distinctively Unitarian one. As to the future state, Unitarians believe in heaven and in hell, but that the latter is corrective and will finally leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day. We must not forget to add that our epitomist thinks it important to state that 'Christian Unitarianism' believes in the existence of God—Unitarian apologists always tell us that,—and that God informs us of him self 'by Revelation, or divine influence upon the mind and conscience of man.' Now this may mean inspiration of the Scripture, or it may mean fallible 'inner light,' we cannot tell which. The capital 'R' seems to imply the former, and the generalized 'man' seems to suggest the latter. When will Unitarians learn to say the thing they mean? Careful ambiguity in philosophic or theologic discussion is in logic not a vice, but a crime."

DRAWING LINES.

Referring to our first editorial article in THE INDEX of January 7, entitled "Where Are We?" and its predecessor in the previous issue, entitled "Inspiration and Anodynes," a private letter says: "In your original essay on 'The Intuitionist and Scientific Schools,' you recognized both schools as integral parts of Free Religion. (INDEX, II, 113.) The line you now draw excludes all Intuitionists."

In other words, it is supposed that we have taken a new position, "drawn a line," and excommunicated some of those whom we formerly recognized as friends of Free Religion! Surprising as this misconception is, it is too grave not to be corrected, especially as what has occurred to one may possibly have occurred to others; and we therefore wish to devote our space this week to a candid consideration of it.

But first of all, though we feel actually ashamed even to suggest so preposterous a notion, it seems that we must formally disclaim all pretension of setting up as a new Pope, and solemnly deny ever having had the hallucination that the key of St. Peter was entrusted to our custody. We cannot "draw a line" anywhere: we cannot include or "exclude" anybody; we can neither perform the rite of baptism nor fulminate bulls of excommunication. All that we have ever dreamed of doing has been to utter our own convictions, and leave everybody else to utter his, without meddling with what is none of our business. It is very late in the day to be obliged to say that Free Religion is not a subject for manipulation by any one, and that "drawing lines" of fellowship is certainly not one of the functions of the editor of this paper.

There are, however, natural divisions among men which may have various causes, and which seldom or never are exactly identical with the artificial divisions established by organizations. Nature does not respect these artificial lines of fellowship, and baffles the attempts of men to make them coincide precisely with her own natural lines. Ideas do indeed aggregate men together or segregate them from each other; but it is in vain that voluntary associations seek to make themselves coextensive with any of these ideal aggregations. From time immemorial the "visible church" has been confessedly non-identical with the "invisible church;" the laws of natural fellowship refuse to be expressed in any creed, covenant, or constitution; and to the end of the chapter human affiliations in the ideal world will defy all attempts to make them submit to any Procrustes. A great idea will find its followers in all communions, and no communion of voluntary origin will ever succeed in getting them all to subscribe to its own articles of agreement.

This impossibility of ever uniting all who love freedom and fellowship in religion by any formal tie of organization was well understood by those who founded the Free Religious Association; and they disavowed the ambition of accomplishing this impossible task, when they made it one of their three chief objects to "increase fellowship in the spirit." In other words, they proposed to foster a natural and not an artificial union, based on catholic ideas rather than on dogmatic creeds, however minimized in extent; and they never expected to see on their own roll of membership any large proportion of the names of those who sympathize with their fundamental objects. There are doubtless thousands that have never even heard of the Free Religious Association, who nevertheless love and comprehend its essential principles far better than many whose names are already enrolled on its books as members. The boundaries of the "visible" and the "invisible churches" of Free Religion are certainly not the same; the former is small and feeble, while the latter is vast and of incalculable influence. And it is the principles and ideas of this larger, unorganized communion which the present Association labor to advance.

Now the first and foremost of these principles is unquestionably that of spiritual freedom—freedom of the human mind, untrammelled by arbitrary authority of any sort, to develop all its faculties according to natural laws and to use them in natural ways. The people who believe in this principle are doubtless to be found in all sects and parties, as is proved by the existence in them all of what is called, by a correct instinct, the "liberal wing." The liberal wings of all these artificial organizations have certainly much in common, even if this community is unconscious; nay, it may be consciously denied without being thereby at all disproved. Since, in society as in the universe at large, motion is universal, either in the direction of evolution or dissolution, amelioration or deterioration, all who move forward really unite in one and the same movement, even although they may not comprehend the fact. In this sense Free Religion includes all who are relatively free; and it may well be doubted whether any one of us is absolutely free. It is a question of more or less. But many of those who are free relatively to their own associates are opposed to other associations which happen to be more advanced; yet the liberal wings in both cases really work towards one and the same ultimate result, however little comprehended this fact may be at the time. For example, the Old Catholics are for liberty as compared with the Jesuits, yet for bondage as compared with the Unitarians; the Unitarians are for liberty as compared with the Old Catholics, yet for bondage as compared with the non-Christian Intuitionists; the non-Christian Intuitionists are for liberty as compared with Christian Unitarians, yet for bondage as compared with the defenders of scientific freedom in its absoluteness. All these liberal wings and parties are working more or less unconsciously towards the ultimate freedom of science, and in this sense all belong to the great army of Free Religion; yet they all belong to the ancient party of Authority, so far as they antagonize the larger freedom from which they still shrink with dread.

Is not the defective analysis which characterizes the passage we have taken above as a text sufficiently obvious in the light of these explanations? Just as Evangelical Protestantism at the same time opposes Romanism in the interest of freedom and Intuitionism in the interest of authority, so Intuitionism at the same time opposes Evangelical Protestantism in the interest of freedom and the scientific method in the interest of authority. At the two extremes stand Rome and Reason, the Catholic Christian Church and the Free Religious Association; and all intermediate positions are liberal or the reverse, according to what they oppose. Putting it roughly, and taking the scientific school as the pure type of Free Religion, Protestantism may be represented in general as half Christian, half Free Religious; Unitarianism as one-tenth Christian, nine-tenths Free Religious; Intuitionism as one-hundredth Christian, ninety-nine-hundredths Free Religious.

This is substantially the view we have taken and repeatedly expressed from the first issue of THE INDEX. So far from "excluding Intuitionists," it includes them under Free Religion just so far as they stand for free thought; and they stand for this completely, with the one reservation of the doctrines of God and immortality, which they decline to submit to the test of thought. This reservation we would indeed have excluded from the ideal of consistent, thorough-going Free Religion; but that is a totally different thing from excluding Intuitionists, as living men and women, from fellowship. We have taken no new position; we have drawn no new "lines;" we have neither "excluded," nor been so infinitely impertinent as to wish to "exclude," any person or number of persons from any fellowship whatever. But we hold still, as we have held long and openly, that the principle of mental freedom will permit no limitation of itself, no reservation from the dominion of thought; and that the Intuitionist is imperfectly true to Free Religion until this reservation is given up. If that is "drawing a line," we cannot help it; but it is not we who draw it. All that we have done is to point out a fact in the nature of things—that the right of free thought involves necessarily the right to examine and decide the great questions of God and Immortality on grounds of reason alone, and that the Intuitionist is unable to abridge this right in favor of any established opinions of his own. In other words, human intellect demands the right of solving all problems of thought in accordance with the laws of thought; and if any "line" is "drawn," it is drawn by Nature alone.

GIRARD COLLEGE.

The letter in reply to criticism on Girard College, printed among the "communications" this week, will be read with interest by those who give thought to the wisdom of such institutions. The preacher of the sermon, "Charity and the Poor," took his impressions of the College from an eminent lawyer, a resident and native of Philadelphia, who gave his judgment deliberately in answer to inquiry, and said that it was shared by very many intelligent people in Philadelphia who had observed the working of the establishment. Others, when questioned, have spoken with indifference of the institution, as not a public benefaction in any noble sense; some, as was natural, have pronounced it an enormous waste of good money. My personal acquaintance in Philadelphia is limited; as a clergyman, I am not allowed to visit the buildings or examine the arrangements. It is quite possible, therefore, that my statements need correction.

The Directors of City Trusts, in their last Report, January, 1874, devote but five pages and a half to Girard College; and two of these are not pertinent to the affairs of the institution itself. They express an "increasingly high appreciation of the importance" of the trust committed to them, affirm that the committee on applications, who visit the orphans in their homes and examine their titles to admission, "are deeply impressed with the inestimable value of this charity to the fatherless children of the Commonwealth, and to the widow or next friend upon whom the child is dependent;" and declare that "the Committee on Instruction, and the few intelligent strangers who have the privilege of visiting the schools, testify to the thoroughness and effectiveness of the teaching." Due provision seems to be made for the sanitary condition of the rooms, for out-door exercise and recreation, for instruction in cleanly habits and decent behavior, for moral training, and such religious culture as the rules of the establishment do not forbid. The list of four hundred and eighty-three pupils whose terms of apprenticeship have expired presents an encouraging view of the usefulness of the institution; for, as Mr. Steel says, nearly every department of serviceable industry is strengthened by them. If the whole number admitted during the twenty-six years the College has existed (1,761) can give as good an account of themselves, its usefulness must be so far conceded.

It must, however, be remembered that the fundamental objections to Girard College are the same which are urged against all asylums, where several hundred people of the same class are kept together for years within the same enclosure, and made subject to the restrictions that the purposes of their confinement require. There is a growing conviction that the very little the indigent can do for themselves is better than the very much the opulent can do for them; and the salutary effects of liberty on mental and moral health, which have been proven in the case of the insane, suggest the wisdom of adopting a new method of treatment for the deserted and outcast of society. The huge orphan asylums of the Roman Catholic Church, notwithstanding the show of utility and beneficence they make, are gravely suspected of being hostile to the permanent interests of society; and this, not because they are sectarian institutions, but because they interfere with the normal action of human nature and the regular working of the social laws. Considerations of orthodoxy and heterodoxy, of sectarianism or anti-sectarianism, though important, are secondary. The philosophy of the method is in question; and so far Girard College comes within the same category with the institutions which modern social reformers distrust.

SOUTHERN FEELING TOWARDS THE COLORED PEOPLE.

In the present disturbed state of our relations with the Southern States, it is interesting to note the expressions used in regard to the colored people by Gov. Smith, of Georgia, in his annual message. He speaks very encouragingly of the prospects of the public school system in the State, but says nothing in regard to the colored schools; although we know from other sources that colored children are not admitted to the public school, and that the few separate schools for them are very poor. But he is obliged to speak of the grant to Atlanta University, which was made by the last General Assembly on condition that a certain number of colored pupils, nominated by the representatives, should be admitted there. These conditions have been complied with, and the amount was paid last year; but the Governor recommends that this appropriation be repealed, because "the class upon whom the burden of taxation chiefly falls" cannot be expected "to support an institution wherein the mischievous doctrine of social equality is practically inculcated." So even this small opportunity for higher education is to be taken from the blacks. Yet, if we mistake not, this University was founded by the American Missionary Association confessedly in the interests of the blacks as well as whites. This is the spirit of the South: "We have been obliged to accept emancipation and a nominal political equality; but we set our faces as a flint against every recognition of the negro as an equal.

We are the rulers and he is to be the ruled, either with the vote or without it."

In conclusion, Governor Smith argues against the civil rights bill, claiming that the laws of the State guarantee equal rights to the negro. (He has just advised against their admission to the State University!) He claims that the self-interest of the whites is a sufficient protection for the colored people:—

"Self-interest, to take no higher view of the subject, would dictate to the white people the policy of forbearance, conciliation, and fair-dealing towards the colored race. Even when a slave, the negro was sure of protection and kind treatment, and now that he has become a free and independent laborer, and possesses every legal right that the white man has, it is still to the interest of the latter that his rights should be carefully guarded, that his efficiency as a laborer should be increased, and that his general condition should be improved in all practicable ways."

We should like to have Governor Smith point out an instance in all history, from Moses down to Harriet Tubman, wherein the self-interest of a ruling party proved a sufficient protection for the subject class. The instance he quotes would hardly be considered a happy one, as most slaves did not consider even their physical well-being very well cared for on account of its value to the master, to say nothing of intellectual and social development.

This spirit in the South is the natural result of slavery. We must meet it with temperance and patience; but we must not trust the negro to its tender mercies. He still needs the protection of the North, which owes him this justice for its long years of inaction and connivance with his oppressors.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—The Christian community here have been recently amused by a new sect, calling themselves "Bible Christians," who have been brought into prominence by great misfortune.

A Mrs. Girling, surrounded by about one hundred and twenty disciples, had been in possession of a small property at Hordle, near Lymington, in the New Forest, trying the experiment of living in strict accordance with the example and precepts of the Early Church. One of their number had advanced £3,000 for the purchase of the estate, £1,000 being left on mortgage, the interest of which the society found themselves unable to pay.

After a reasonable allowance of time had been granted them, the mortgagee exercised his legal right of foreclosing, and they were in due course of law ejected from the property and turned into the road.

As the season has been unusually severe, you can easily imagine the danger as well as the distress of this summary ejection.

The shelter at first offered to them was absolutely refused; and they passed the first night, at all events, in a drenching rain and sleet, dancing and singing hymns, and consoling each other by frequent ejaculations, "It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good."

Nothing would induce the disciples to desert or disobey their "Mother," Mrs. Girling; and at last she consented to the community (now consisting of about seventy persons) occupying a barn offered them by a kind farmer in the neighborhood.

This act of humanity on the part of Mr. Beazly was followed by the intervention of the Hon. Auber-on Herbert, whom no one would accuse of being a Christian in creed—still less a "Bible Christian." He appealed through the Times on behalf of these poor people, and made good use of his opportunity to cast in the teeth of the Orthodox world the parallel superstitions which they themselves hold. The features of the creed and practice of these "Bible Christians" included, among others, the belief in the Godhead of Christ, and in his sure return to earth during their lifetime. They believe that they "will not taste of death till they see the Son of God coming in the clouds of heaven."

They also believe in the direct and miraculous protection of Providence, rising above all fear of sickness, and want, and danger. They believe in the efficacy of prayer precisely as taught them by the apostle James; and in consequence they refuse all medical aid in sickness, and can with difficulty be induced to accept aid offered them by human hands.

They believe in the Holy Ghost as set forth in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the Pauline Epistles; namely, a Divine indwelling which supersedes the human will, and even controls and animates the movements of the body.

The Holy Ghost not only excites them to dance or shake during their devotions, but enables them to see visions, to work miracles, to speak with tongues, and to prophesy.

In practice, they are communists, having nothing belonging to the individual, but all things belonging to God. They are also strictly celibate, and there is no ground for suspecting them to be otherwise than pure and chaste in their habits.

The only fault of which they can be accused is that of gross mismanagement, by which they were involved in debt they could not pay. Their misfortune is that they believed their New Testament too well, and that they thought it really possible to rule their lives in this century and in this "Christian" England in strict accordance with the examples, precepts, and beliefs of Christ and his apostles.

From our stand-point, we cannot regret that the experiment has been made, nor can we wonder that the experiment has been a total failure. But we are moved with indignation against those who, while professing to believe the New Testament to be divine and infallible, Christ to be "very God of very God" and to be coming some day to judge the world, and the apostles and Early Church to be the inspired oracles of duty and examples of life, nevertheless openly deride this little band of sincere believers for their earnest endeavors to live strictly in accordance with their belief.

Practical acceptance of part of the New Testament teaching, and practical rejection of another part, is only consistent conduct in those who deny its divine origin and authority; but monstrously inconsistent in those who profess to maintain it. The Christians who have joined in this melancholy laugh at the spectacle of a "faith showing itself by works" ought to be ashamed of themselves, and deserve much more the ridicule which they have heaped upon the "Bible Christians."

We do not blame them for their eclecticism; we do not blame them for yielding to the dictates of common sense, and letting it supersede some foolish and wild Scriptural injunctions; we do not reproach them for ordering their lives more in harmony with the greater light and knowledge of this age; no, nor do we blame them much for the inconsistency of their course with the creeds they profess, for inconsistency is but a human failing; but we do and we must denounce as both cruel and pharisaical their derision of the Bible Christians for that very sincerity and consistency which have made them heroic.

No doubt, the episode in the New Forest will do good; there are many good, sincere Christians who do not know their own inconsistency whose eyes will be opened, by the collapse of Mrs. Girling's community, to see the hopeless incongruity between some of the examples and precepts of the Bible, and the true life which God-loving men ought to live in this later period of the march of mankind.

It will have done much, if it should have served to remind the Orthodox world that "people who live in glass houses should not throw stones."

Of the attempt to deal with Mrs. Girling as a lunatic (which, however, signally failed) the Hon. Auber-on Herbert says with great pungency:—

"Another and a clearer-headed generation might arise which might learn to look upon the superstition of the educated as more pitiable than the superstition of the ignorant, and might be induced to include in a verdict of religious insanity even distinguished and Orthodox prelates, who, like David in their scanty equipment of fighting gear, undertook in some thirty pages of a quarterly to demolish the scientific speculations of the age in which they live. At all events, in this matter discretion will be useful, for it may be difficult to find some people to judge who are the madmen."

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E., Jan. 2, 1875.

LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU sent in 1718 the following description of French ladies to England: "I must tell you something of the French ladies: I have seen all the beauties, and such nauseous creatures, so fantastically absurd in their dress, so monstrously unnatural in their paint,—their hair cut short and curled round their faces, loaded with powder that makes it look like white wool, and on their cheeks to their chins, unmercifully laid on, a shining red japan that glistens in a most flaming manner, so that they seem to have no resemblance to human faces, and I am apt to believe took the first hint of their dress from a fair sheep newly ruddled. 'Tis with pleasure I recollect my dear, pretty countrywomen."—Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's Life and Letters.

GIRARD COLLEGE.

No. 600 MARKET ST., PHILADELPHIA, }
Jan. 17, 1875. }

MR. O. B. FROTHINGHAM:

Dear Sir,—In a sermon delivered by you entitled "Charity and the Poor," and published in THE INDEX of December 31, you make allusion to the Girard College, to which you will allow me to reply:—

Your position as a public teacher and seeker after truth makes it impossible for you intentionally to misrepresent a noble charity, whose great usefulness is well-known to every one at all acquainted with its operations. As it must, therefore, be from a want of proper information that you so fearfully decry one of the most useful institutions of the age, I hope you will permit me, with the best intentions, to endeavor to set the matter before you in its correct aspect.

Having been a pupil of Girard College for more than five years, and maintaining during the eighteen years which have since elapsed a lively interest in its welfare and management, I feel well qualified to judge of the results of the institution, regarding it as my duty to endeavor respectfully to correct the misapprehensions of the College evidenced in your sermon.

The purpose for which Mr. Girard endowed the institution was to take charge of, educate, feed, and clothe poor male children, who had lost one or both parents, and fit them to become useful and self-supporting citizens. This, then, according to some "thoughtful people," has been a failure. Such a remark could only come from persons entirely unacquainted with the institution; probably residents of some other locality, their opinions have been formed upon hearsay evidence, or the reports of other equally misinformed. No more complete charity, or successful accomplishment of a testator's purposes, could possibly exist. Children are received, kindly cared for, and educated. The establishment is no "sumptuous asylum," but a home. What would people desire such an institution to be? Is comfort to have no part in the domicile in which the child is to pass up through the susceptible age of youth? Must children, in order to make useful citizens, be brought up under the Squeers régime, abused, starved, and degraded? Of what natural discipline and education of circumstances are these boys deprived? Generally remaining in the college until fifteen or sixteen years of age, is it to be supposed that other boys of equal age living out in the world are better fitted to undertake the business of life than they? Is the constant association of over five hundred youths in all conditions of daily existence, in the study-rooms, in school, at meals, and during the hours of recreation, no preparation for active life? There is no training for "the world's broad field of battle" like that obtained through the association together of a large number of boys of different ages. Every phase of human nature comes in play, and the boy learns that he must assert his individuality and look out for himself, or else be over-ridden by others and take an inferior place.

The mode of life at Girard College does not differ in any essential regard from that of any respectable boarding-school in the country, except that the inmates of the former are more amenable to discipline than pupils who can resent any fancied severity, by leaving an institution where it is shown. The course of instruction is practical, and designed to fit them for any position they may fill after graduating; while the training is such as to instill into their minds a love of honesty and industry. The boys are made to understand that, while the college does all in its power to fit them for the struggles of life, by furnishing an excellent education and pointing out the difficulties to be encountered, they must depend entirely upon their own exertions for success. She provides her children with tools, and shows them their use, but requires that they should find the work to which they are to be applied, and must themselves be responsible for the excellence or neglect with which it is executed.

Since the opening of the Girard College in 1843, almost two thousand children have been rescued from poverty and started on their way through life. This is surely not a nuisance, nor is it such to relieve the poor and despairing mother of a burden which only parental love enables her to bear from day to day. Ask the hard-working and conscientious woman, struggling to provide daily bread for her fatherless children, if the Girard College is a nuisance, which takes her little one, rears it with almost her solicitude, gives it advantages of instruction only the most wealthy can command, and turns it out a man, whom her mother's heart, with joy, claims as her son. It would be just as correct to say that the Cooper Institute was an injury to the people of New York, or that Yale College was useless in its purpose.

That it does not throw upon society a number of lads whom it is harder to provide for than for the poor themselves is easily proven. If you will be kind enough to refer to the Annual Report of the Board of City Trusts, which I send you, and look at the names and occupations of the graduates, beginning at page 102, you will notice that almost all callings are represented. Your probably not being familiar with local points in our city prevents my bringing as vividly before your eyes the work accomplished by some of my school-fellows. The buildings for the great Sanitary Fair of 1864 were designed by one of them, as was also the magnificent Masonic Temple and many other public edifices and private residences. One of our most prominent lawyers, who held for several years the presidency of Select Council, was a pupil of Girard College. As a rule, wherever the graduates have located, they have earned and retained the respect of the entire community; many, although commencing life without pecuniary capital, by indefatigable exertion have achieved competence, while the great majority are quietly fulfilling their duties as conscientiously and faithfully as it is possible for them to do.

Having, I hope, succeeded in the object for which I ventured to address you, please allow me to add a few words. The Girard College is fortunately independent of the world in a pecuniary point of view, but its good name is of none the less value; remarks such as those contained in your sermon and publicly made injure it, however innocent of such a design they may be. You have proclaimed and published broadcast sayings which give an incorrect impression of a good work; though I feel without intention of harm and under a misapprehension of facts. Should you not, then, in the same manner, after satisfying yourself as to the state of the case, make a correction which will have equal publicity?

I have the honor to be, yours respectfully,

HENRY STEEL.

VIRTUE AND INTELLIGENCE AS CONDITIONS OF SUFFRAGE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

In your issue of Dec. 17, 1874, a correspondent (F. M. Holland), in remarking upon the question of extending suffrage, says: "The first duty of the reformer is not to increase the quantity of our voters, but to improve their quality."

It is seldom that so much of importance is said in so few words.

Let us consider how it comes that we, as a nation, have largely overlooked this golden truth, premature authorized suffrage and the general powers inherent to our system in consequence of such oversight, and are reaping the direful consequences.

Our national order clearly involves universal suffrage; but it distinctly plants this broad range of political power upon the equally broad ground of universal intelligence and virtue, which it makes the only true base of suffrage. All the grand privileges, powers, and rights affirmed by our national system as rightly belonging to every man without exception—all the principles of freedom and equality—presuppose, at least, the existence of virtue and intelligence as the only rightful ground of such conditions of citizenship.

Here, then, we had a national system, as delineated in its principles, that implied the universal prevalence of truly educated character and power—our public conduct endowing the citizens accordingly,—when actually those essential conditions did not exist, and the powers conferred, consequently, were sure to hazard, if not destroy, the system. We had national quantity in citizenship quite fully inaugurated and operative when the involved quality was largely wanting. Such was manifestly the difficulty; and how was the practical solution to be found? With a national code that affirmed unexceptional rights and powers of citizenship, and basing such rights and powers, of course, upon amply qualified manhood, while yet such conditions in character were largely wanting, the national conduct should have been this: Instead of regarding the system as a structure matured and ready to dispense all that it promised in its essential nature at the very first, our statesmanship should have seen that, while magnificent in its conceptions, perfect in its principles, it was only an involved form of nationality, which, though embodying in its nature every promise of civil excellence that man could desire, must first be evolved; consistently developed and built accordingly. The builders should have seen that only plans, specifications, and foundation materials could be given at first; that superstructural materials must be seized, fashioned, and applied in steady conformity to the designed end, ere there could be any rational thought of full occupancy and use consistently with the great design. In plain terms, those who gave initial form to our national system should have known and clearly shown that national systems are not exceptions to those universal laws which make every good known to man a form of growth from initial germ to adequate fruition. Wherefore all they could distinctly supply at first was a mere germinal form, with principles, or nature, sufficiently defined to guide future conduct to successful achievement—to shape, steady, and direct constructive methods so that involved excellencies should be surely evolved and embodied in requisite institutions to give consistent and lasting effect finally. This future conduct of statesmanship must aim first to qualify and then empower. The conditions of material, that did not and could not exist at first, could be realized only through developing means. Such means were only to be found in systems of education competent to bring out and establish the whole nature of man, so making him capable of the privileges and powers of citizenship contemplated by the system. Thus while the logic of the system perfected was big with the promise of all human excellence and power, the logic of the system in constructive process demanded tutelary discipline, restraint, and limitations manifold. But clearly such discipline and restraints, being constantly employed with design more fully to qualify and empower the subjects of them, could not be much felt as burdens or pressures. They would be recognized and accepted, mostly, as requisite to steady and direct the state of minority, in citizenship, to which they belonged.

True national development, under our system, meant the unfolding of character and institutions in strict accordance with our national principles of manly worth and power in citizenship, whatever were the immediate limitations either in personal power or institutional forms. It meant that the prime resources and energies of the nation should be directed to unfold human character and power with corresponding development of institutional forms. Not alone mental development was concerned, for the physical powers of the citizen were to be educated, instructed, and held to active expression in all cases where circumstances and inclinations threatened neglect or harmful use. Hence national and State industrial schools, graded and variously constituted, were as much in demand as were those that concern only the mental powers; thus assuring all citizens in the various industries and artisanships so essential to worthy membership of a worthy republic.

Having started upon the mistaken idea that the nation was consummated when only the national germ was given and its planting effected, and having thereupon proceeded to invest every form of weakness and grossness with the prerogatives belonging only to true manhood, our statesmanship had no care for distinctively national development. It mistakenly sought national growth and strength in extent of territory, population, maritime power, manufactures, and other like interests common to all civilized nations, of whatever institutional character. Under a true system of national conduct institutions would develop and mature with the gradual growth and maturity of the nation; hence no form should be deemed permanent till finally perfected and ordered in scientific accordance with the whole system. Previous to such result formation and transformation must continually take place: only being sure that the involved principles or ultimate objects of the nation should dictate such forms and reforms. Partial and special interests of any kind, whether moved by a person or rings of persons, or civic organisms, should never be allowed to frustrate the designs and interests of a people's government.

Let our statesmen come to true conceptions, both as to the needs and methods of national development upon national principles strictly, take a new departure therefrom, providing the consistent means of universal education and instruction, under the stern stress of compulsion that will hold every particle of human driftwood to the use and advantages of those means, and a new glow of national health will at once begin; and with this, consistently maintained, the nation will go on, outgrowing and supplanting the swarming evils that now peril it, and come, in a few generations, to realize the nobility of character and unrestricted rights and powers involved, but which, otherwise, can never be experienced. If reformers will no longer waste their energies in beating branches—in denouncing and battling with special evils, but will unite to regulate and give proper nurture to the root whence growth and fruit are derived, healthy growth will at once begin, and complete success be sure in the end.

Special evils, as objects of direct action to restrain or extinguish, need hardly to be named. Let us, instead, go straight to the root and build steadily upon national principles, which are the principles of perfect humanity, and all growth will become orderly and all fruit perfect. Thus may we duly qualify and ultimately attain full measure, both of quality and quantity; not only as regards some special ends, but as to all results requisite to fulfil the national integrity. Thus may we supplant the miserable greed of self-service, now so common and distracting, call out the latent spirit of public service, which alone can truly animate the conduct of a commonwealth or people's government, and unite the whole people in endeavors and interests full of the promise of actual national fruition and consequent universal beneficence.

THERON GRAY.

"THEOLOGICAL PENALTIES."

In THE INDEX of December 31 there appeared an article from the Liberal Christian with the above heading. The writer, with commendable charity, urges upon all true friends of liberalism to be cautious in raising issues which are likely to put a strain upon the consciences of our young ministers.

Half a century ago, when the notion prevailed that no man could preach except he was "called of God," men wrestled for months, sometimes even years, with an innate timidity of disposition, a sense of unworthiness, a fear of the responsibilities of the position, before they acceded to the divine behest. But, the decision once made, they stepped forth into the ministry with a depth of conviction, a resoluteness of purpose, that sealed the mountains of doubt, and made a clean path through the sloughs of despond. Though seemingly lacking every other qualification, this one quality of earnestness, this "woe is me if I preach not the gospel of Christ," was an abundant assurance of success.

Since the decline of this old-fashioned dogma, the clerical ranks are filled up with a class of men of quite a different type,—men who need the ministry more than it may be said to need them. The choice between preaching and any other of a dozen vocations may have turned upon the cast of a die, or throw of a penny; or, if he deliberated at all, it was because the young candidate for clerical honors saw from the vantage ground of the pulpit his way clear to a social privilege and position which he could never hope to attain from a less favorable standpoint.

I would impute no unworthy motives. Young men entering the ministry are as candid and conscientious as the balance of mankind. Their chief trouble springs not more from a false estimate of their own capabilities than from a misapprehension of the task set before them. In these days, when the religious atmosphere is thick with questions of vital importance, questions touching the very foundations of all religions, no man can hope long to maintain his position as a religious teacher who is not able to give a rational account of the faith he professes to hold. When, therefore, one of these well-meaning but weak brethren finds himself installed over a modern parish of liberal thinkers, the result is what our friend so aptly describes. "A few years of superficial experience under the impulse which first sent him into the ministry" finds him waging an uneven war with unsettled convictions on the one hand and unsettled bills on the other. The spectacle of human failure, especially when it involves the welfare of those in no wise responsible for the causes which have induced it, is always a sorry one, and deserving of human sympathy. But it is so entirely in the order of Nature, when a weak man undertakes a strong man's work, that, though there be room for pity, there is none for surprise. Perhaps that desire to plant churches, that denominational zeal which results in supplying every country town of a thousand inhabitants with a half dozen, more or less, of feeble societies representing as many different shades of religious faith, is partly responsible for this abundant supply of cheap ministers. But, whatever the cause, no sane person can expect the world to stand still to save any man's conscience or livelihood. The world is full of honest and honorable work sufficient to employ all the energies that are incarnated in human brain and muscle. No man who has a fair modicum of either need sit down in despair because he cannot acceptably preach.

There is, without doubt, a well-grounded apprehension among our Unitarian friends as to the future prospects of Liberal Christianity in this country. The flower of their young ministry have already gone over to Free Religion. Many others are casting their eyes in the same direction. The men who have been and still are the pride and ornament of the denomination are in the decline of their powers. The next decade must find some places vacant. And what then? To those who value denominational success above every other interest, the outlook is not encouraging.

CLEVELAND, O.

BARBARIAN MONEY.

How long shall it dwell in the bosom of civilization to poison the fountains of its life?

"The use of substances of intrinsic value as the materials of a currency is a barbarism."—RUSKIN.

All national money was first barbarous—is now semi-barbarous; and while it continues we can never attain a higher state than semi-civilization.

We cannot call society civilized where men prey upon or live upon the labor of others. We must have a money to correspond with our progress in science and the mechanic arts, or "history will continue to repeat itself," "world without end," because the same causes will always produce the same results. "God is not mocked."

If we were called upon for the first time in the world's history to devise a medium of exchange or money, should we be likely to go to digging into the bowels of the earth or hunting in the gorges of mountains for metals the most scarce, or diving into the depths of the ocean for pearls most difficult and dangerous to obtain, to find it?

This was appropriate enough to barbarians, with their meagre cerebral development, their fondness for trinkets and glitter of diamonds; but would it be becoming a people professing to be civilized? Should we not be likely to search our intellects instead of the mountains and the ocean's bed—draw upon our knowledge of science and the arts, and see if something could not be devised better for a medium of exchange than pieces of a metal so scarce as to set everybody scrambling for their possession? Something better even than parchment money based exclusively upon a metal? Should we not seek to relieve mankind of this disease called avarice, and try to save our souls from contamination and our bodies from want and suffering?

It seems to me, if the thing was now for the first time proposed, the task would be easy; but our minds are mystified and stultified by the use of a false money.

The first question we should be likely to ask ourselves would probably be: What function do we want a medium of exchange, or money, to perform? Do we want it to enable the cunning and crafty to enrich themselves by the labor of the simple and honest? Do we want it to be an instrument in the hands of the more intelligent by which they may appropriate from two to four fifths of the labor-products of the less intelligent? Do we want it to enable a Stewart or an Astor to own half a city like New York? Or to enable the Scotts and Vanderbilts to become kings of highways [highwaymen are not so dangerous]; or a few men to own Fall River, Boston, Lowell, Lawrence, the State itself; or a Slater to own three villages, and virtually the inhabitants thereof, in Webster, Worcester County, Mass? I think we want none of these. But do we want justice and equity established in this nation—in this world of ours? If we do, then the answer to the first question is simple and easy: A medium of exchange, or money, should enable all persons to exchange their labor or service (or labor-products, which is practically the same thing) one with another, the world over, with no loss to either, but with all the equal and mutual advantage to each by which two farmers or carpenters now "change works."

There are a variety of ways in which this could be done; and if there was no false system of money to be superseded, the following, I think, would be best adapted to equitable and universal exchange: Let depositories (or warehouses) be established in sufficient numbers, and in locations to suit the public convenience, where every kind of staple articles, not subject to immediate decay, could be deposited in the hands of responsible parties, where they could be delivered at the labor cost of production and exchange estimated in the number of hours of labor, and not in the turns of the currency. The parties holding these deposits, whether individuals or agencies established (or sanctioned, as the post-office or express companies are sanctioned) by the people, could issue certificates to depositors to one-half or two-thirds of the amount of the labor cost of production, risk, and exchange, entitling the holder of each certificate to a specific kind, quality, and quantity of these deposits, at the same time giving him a receipt for the full amount deposited. This would furnish the money required, and plenty of it.

The "volume" of such money in circulation would not need regulating by the financial wisdom of legislators. It would always be redeemable in gold, silver, copper, or some other equally "valuable" merchandise, except temporarily and locally in case of fire or some other accident, which would be covered by insurance.

It would never be above or below par. It could not be monopolized, nor could interest be obtained upon it, and there could be no fluctuation in prices, but only a steady diminution in prices as the labor cost of production should be diminished by the introduction of scientific methods and labor-saving machinery.

But, owing to prejudices and false habits, some modification of this proposition must be made, or people could not be persuaded to believe it was money at all, it is so simple. Yet the money of the future must contain the elements proposed in the foregoing, or it would not secure the emancipation of labor, which is the object in view.

The money now in use is elementarily the same in character that money has always been. It is adapted only to speculative purposes; i. e., to "buying and selling for gain," which is a crime against society denounced by the Bible and condemned by the wise and good of all ages. It is not adapted to, nor can it be used to effect, an equitable exchange of labor or service; yet the character of a circulating medium must be such as to effect that, or labor will continue to be plundered and enslaved.

No analytical statement is required to prove this, for we have only to look at the world's history and its condition to-day to see that those who do the work of the world and create its wealth (except the natural wealth which God has created, and which should bear no price) are always poor, and vastly the larger number suffering extreme poverty. Those who build all the houses own, comparatively, no houses. Those who make all the clothing and fancy goods have only the coarsest of the former and shabbiest of the latter to use, and scant at that; and because men do not always work with alacrity, all the day time, under these circumstances, they are often called lazy by those who never performed a useful day's work in their lives. O Shame, where is thy blush!

No adage is more true than the one which says that "money [of the past] is the root of all evil." But I hear some one say, It is not the money, but the love of it that does the harm. But if money was but the representation of Truth, Justice, and Equity, would the love of it harm any one?

And such is the kind of money we must have, or labor is doomed to be enslaved in the future as it has been in the past, with all the direful train of consequences.

Is such a kind of money possible? Yes. Can it be introduced in the midst of a false civilization and in the presence of a false money? Yes, as easily as railroads were introduced in the midst of streets and turnpikes, or telegraphs in the presence of post-horses and ocean-mails, if only the intelligent and conscientious people of the nation will it. I will endeavor hereafter to show how this can be done.

E. D. LINTON.

IMMORTALITY.

The subject of individual immortality, like many others, has been profoundly affected by modern science, and still more so by the modern scientific spirit. The main arguments in support of it are four:—

First, the consciousness of it; second, the need of another world wherein the injustices of this may be compensated; third, the aspiration and desire for it; fourth, the sense of interruption when the young die.

Let these arguments be considered:—

First, the consciousness of immortality is not felt by many, the writer for one; and, any way, consciousness is no criterion of absolute truth. The natural love of life, a necessary parallel with struggle, worry, and depression, is present in excess, like other instincts (amativeness for instance), and in health imagination is apt to prolong it beyond the grave.

Second, the admission that injustice goes unbalanced in this world would lead to the inference that a similar state of things would be found in another, conducted by the same Power. It is admitted that a small fraction of the total operations of Nature do seem unjust, but knowledge is continually reducing the fraction; and it is the least difficulty to attribute this residue to our ignorance rather than to the imperfection of Nature.

Third, the aspirations for immortality wherein our higher nature may be developed unhampered by the lower are less frequent and forcible than the contrary manifestations of the animal in man. Man, "on the isthmus of a middle state," is a link in evolution; while a record of the past, he is a prophecy of the future; while the heir of the animal, he may be the ancestor of what may feel demeaned by the title "coming man." And so the aspirations of the mind find an explanation in the same philosophy that traces the survival of instincts.

Fourth, the sense of interruption at premature death is modified, when it is seen that the inexorable laws of life have been violated; the life of a man who from infancy and childhood, through youth and manhood, has gradually declined to old age and senility, suggests nothing else; the faculties withdraw as gradually as they came.

The normal rather than the abnormal life should be the criterion, and statistics show that in Europe the average duration of life is steadily increasing. While the short life of a youth prematurely cut off is an arc, and at first view would suggest a prolongation, the normal life of man is a circle and suggests nothing.

This doctrine of immortality is an integral feature of a body of ideas wherein Creation, Spontaneity, Gratuitous, etc., found place. All such ideas the achievements and spirit of modern science oppose; enjoyment must be earned by its exact equivalent of work, trouble, or pain; it can be created no more than force or matter can. Experience has always said this; but the constant desire of men to get something for nothing has led to the invention of a future state—a heaven impossibly better than earth; a very safe invention, for, if we do not survive the grave, we can never twit the theologian with it.

We can suppose one of our ancestors just sufficiently advanced to imagine the advantages realized in modern civilization: entire safety from wild beasts, protection from extreme heat and cold, antidotes for malaria, rapid travel, instantaneous communication of messages, etc. If he considered that coming state very happy,—after it was paid for, our experience proves him wrong; so we may be as well satisfied with this era as with any other, for we are sure that action and reaction shall be equal in the future as now.

Life in this is like death, that it costs just what it is worth; and when this is realized, the dread of death disappears.

There never has been any unbelief in the resolution of the human body into its component gases, and the modern tendency is to the belief that no line can be drawn between animate and inanimate matter, and that even an atom of gas in its degree may be alive and conscious, and that man is a complex molecule built up of atoms whose natures determine his.

One of the plain lessons of Nature is that matter persists and forms do not; if men are to persist, why not all forms until new ones shall be impossible by the exhaustion of material?

MONTREAL.

"THY MONEY PERISH WITH THEE."

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

IN THE INDEX of December 31, I see an extract from a sermon preached in Boston on December 6, by Bishop Haven, of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The sermon was a "fervent appeal for contributions to the missionary cause," and contained the following:—

"They (the Methodists) must send out their missions, or they could not live. But to do that they had to have money. If they had money they would soon have all Europe, all Asia, all Africa in their hands!"

This greed for money is deplorable in individuals—terrible in the Church. Out of it spring all, or nearly all, the evils of the world. Above all other sins, avarice is of the devil. Forty years ago the West, from Pittsburgh to St. Louis, from Chicago to New Orleans, was peopled with the clergy of the Methodist Church,—rough, uncouth, uncultured, strong men, loving God, their religion, and their fellows with an intensity which prompted them to untold privations and hardships, and asking only, "How can we serve the Master?" Honest they were, too, and natural; ready to pray for a soul overburdened with sin, or trounce a camp-meeting rough with equal gusto and on the shortest possible notice. When a boy, in a backwoods village in Indiana, I remember hearing one of these muscular missionaries named Haven (can it be possible he was a relation of the bishop? Who knows?) relate from a camp-meeting platform how he had travelled hundreds of miles; waded swamps; buffeted swollen streams; defied wild beasts and wild men, and preached over one hundred discourses in twelve months. Now mark: He closed the statement with the assertion that he had accomplished all this, and received therefor only one hundred and fifty dollars in money—did not ask for a donation, and only thanked God that he had given him the strength and will to do his duty. No, no, bishop! It is not money that you want, but, verily, something harder to obtain than filthy lucre; something the Methodist Church once possessed, but will never have again, for it comes to no church but once in its history. It was youth, and vitality, and a self-sacrificing love of earnest, hearty, natural religion; and all this the era of wealth, and cushioned pews, and swelling organs has driven into the background as vulgar and intolerable.

Permit me to give Bishop Haven (I do wonder if he is a relative of "Old Sorrel"!) a text for his next missionary discourse: "When Simon saw that through laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money, saying, 'Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost.' But Peter said unto him, 'Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money.'" (Acts viii., 18-20.)

Very truly yours,

FRANK J. MEAD.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,
 has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
 PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. ABBOT. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

RADICAL LECTURES.

Having recently left the Church for the sake of freedom and truth, I am now ready to lecture on to liberal people. I will speak on—

LIBERAL SUBJECTS

1. THE RELATION OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION.
2. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.
3. THE ANTAGONISM OF CHRISTIANITY TO CIVILIZATION.
4. THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

Other lectures also on interesting subjects.

I am willing to go West, if an engagement can be made for a sufficient number of lectures to make it an inducement; and to settle with any liberal society on terms mutually satisfactory.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES

The Committee of the Free Religious Association, in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons, again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below,—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged.—

REASONS FOR USING THEEUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THEODORE PARKER :

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———.

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

For List of Liberal Leagues, see next page.

GLIMPSES.

THE GENUINE radical measures the thinker by his thought, and not the thought by the thinker.

DR. VAN DE WARKER, in the Popular Science Monthly for February, has an article on "The Relations of Women to the Professions and Skilled Labor" which is likely to excite even more commotion in reformatory circles than Dr. Clarke's Sex in Education did last winter.

THE CHICAGO Times says of Mr. Charles D. B. Mills, who is now lecturing in the West, that "he is no dry scientific explorer, but a devout student of the religious unfolding of humanity." It also says that the "best representatives of the intelligence and culture of Chicago society attend his lectures."

THE Independent tells this pithy story: "We once heard a sharp thinker thus addressed: 'What! Do you say you do not believe anything you do not understand? Do you understand how the grass grows?' 'No,' was the reply, 'and I do not believe how the grass grows. I believe that it grows, and that I understand.'"

THE SUICIDE of Miss Crissy Hacker, at White's Valley, Pennsylvania, about a fortnight since, is an extraordinary instance of religious fanaticism. The poor girl burned herself to death on a pyre of her own construction, as a sacrifice to "her Immanuel" in expiation of the "unpardonable sin," which she imagined herself to have committed. Superstition still bears its deadly fruits even in this age of comparative light.

A VERY pleasant meeting of some sixty ladies and gentlemen was held, last Saturday evening, in the parlors of Mrs. Kimball at the Commonwealth Hotel in this city, to listen to an essay from Miss Townsend on "Some Questions Concerning Woman." The essay was spirited and full of interest, and its style excellent. A discussion followed, which was participated in by Rev. Messrs. Hoyt and C. C. Carpenter, Mrs. Severance, Miss Hotchkiss, Jennie Collins, and others. The meeting altogether was very successful, which was largely owing to the skilful and graceful hospitality dispensed by the hostess. A. W. S.

SAA KEE, a Chinese teacher in California, has published a caustic and indignant protest in the San Francisco Chronicle against the interference of Christian missionaries with the religion of his own countrymen at home and abroad. He accuses converted Chinamen of being the "most sycophantic, fawning, and contemptible of all our people"; he declares that "the question of sending missionaries from China to America has been argued in our councils at home, but our best men (as they should) frowned upon it at once, and, strenuously advocating the religion of Confucius, said, 'Let us mind our own business.'" He concludes: "I will only say to the Christians, Keep your people, as pretended teachers, out of our country, do not meddle with our dearest and most cherished ideas, and our people will thank you."

THE PAINE MEMORIAL BUILDING, and Home of the Boston Investigator, was dedicated according to announcement on Friday, January 29. Mr. Horace Seaver welcomed the public in the morning, and pronounced the dedicatory address in the afternoon. In the evening Mr. B. F. Underwood made an address, followed by Messrs. Abbot, Barker, Mendum, and Henderson. A public ball concluded the exercises at a late hour. The fine building was crowded all day with enthusiastic friends and sympathetic visitors, and a happier gathering has seldom been held anywhere. Mr. Seaver and Mr. Mendum were overwhelmed with congratulations on the successful accomplishment of their cherished purpose, and the pleasure they so evidently felt was considered by all present to have been well earned by their long and faithful service to the cause of free thought. This brief notice is all that is possible in this issue of THE INDEX.

A GLOOMY picture of Louisiana prospects is drawn in another column by one of our correspondents. Every true patriot is now anxiously seeking light upon his duty respecting the Southern question; and this description of the crisis as it appears to a thoughtful and candid observer on the spot ought by no means to be overlooked. Is it indeed true that the National government is reduced to the necessity either of a military occupation of the South or else of a total surrender of the principles for which the great civil war was fought through to the end? We cannot believe that the case is so bad as that; but if it is, we cannot doubt which of the two alternatives will be embraced. If the turbulent Southern element is determined to precipitate a new conflict, it will fare even worse than before; and all that is wanted to render certain a new "uprising of a great people" is undoubted information as to the fact. But all the more must the country demand that enormities shall not be perpetrated upon the South in the name of Republican principles. The blacks should be defended against White Leagues at any and every cost; but none the less should the whites be saved from bloodsuckers of the Warmoth and Kellogg stamp. Charles Sumner was right in his doctrine of "State suicide through secession," and the wisdom of the "impractical" idealist becomes every day more patent. The great political reaction of last autumn did not mean repudiation of the results of the war, but irrepressible indignation at the wickedness of Republican leaders; and if it becomes plainly inevitable that the nation must choose between the two alternatives presented by our correspondent, we believe that Charles Sumner's rejected doctrine will be even at this late day practically adopted.

THE following passage in a letter just received from Judge Hoadley, of Cincinnati, and dated January 26, was apparently intended for publication, and Mr. Hallowell himself would be the last to wish it pigeon-holed: "I should like to put in a very earnest protest against the sentiments of Mr. Hallowell's article in the last INDEX, in which he characterized as White Leaguers of the North a vast number of our fellow-citizens, constituting, as I am sure they ought to and believe they do, the great majority of the Northern people, many of whom are as warm friends of freedom as is Mr. H. I believe myself the Kellogg government of Louisiana to be a very bad fraud, and unsupported by any considerable number of people of intelligence in Louisiana. If the right hand of power of the Federal administration should be withdrawn, it would go down in a day, and be succeeded, in my judgment, by an era, not perhaps of prosperity, but of comparative quiet and orderly, honest administration. The mischief in that State results from the fact that by force and fraud the will of the majority is thwarted and defeated, and that not in the interest of good, but of very bad government. The freedom-loving people of the North cannot afford in time of peace to have minority government backed up by Federal bayonets, and sustained by the precedents of the wicked intervention at Topeka or the righteous dispersion during war of the Maryland Legislature. The honest people of the North will not, even to secure the vote of Louisiana for Grant or some other Republican in the electoral college of 1876, encourage the wasteful and profligate maladministration prevailing in Louisiana. I will go as far as any man to secure the execution of the fifteenth Amendment and the equal rights of the freedmen, which I labored in a humble way many years to procure the adoption of; but it surely is not necessary, to accomplish this object, to give up honest government or government by the ballot."

Will the Coming Man attend Church?

A SERMON DELIVERED IN THE FREE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, BLOOMINGTON, ILLINOIS, JAN. 10, 1875.

BY REV. J. S. THOMSON.

"The church in the wilderness."—St. Stephen.

The church of popular theology is fast losing its authority over the laity. Many of our best lay thinkers and writers have ignored the theologic claims of the Protestant church; and the number of such thinkers and writers is rapidly increasing. The people are learning to respect the opinions of "scientists" and philosophers on religious questions; and there is a growing belief in the final victory of science over many of the theologic conceptions of our ancestors. Some radicals hold that the churches are founded entirely in error, and that, therefore, as knowledge increases, religious organizations must decrease, until public worship of every form will fall into disuse. In view of this opinion, the question, "Will the Coming Man attend Church?" is both important and pertinent, and it should be examined carefully, conscientiously, and charitably.

The present question suggests another: What will the Coming Church be? Will it be Roman Catholic or Protestant, Presbyterian or Methodist, Conservative or Liberal? We must answer the latter question before we can attempt to answer the former. A church is an assembly, great or small, of men and women that believe in the existence of Deity, the immortality of the soul, and the necessity and helpfulness of public worship. The main question, then, may be resolved into three others: Will men and women continue to believe in the existence of Deity? Will they still deem it to be their duty to worship him collectively? Will they always discharge that duty? In other words, Will the coming generations be theistic, devotional, and conscientious?

Before answering these questions, let us examine the statement so often made, both by extreme radicals and extreme conservatives, that "church attendance is continually decreasing." We must concede that there is a very large non-church element in modern society. We believe that many neglect to attend public worship for the following four reasons:—

I. Unattractive Preaching.—Many of our conservative preachers fail to touch the hearts of those persons who are strong believers in the Evangelical creeds. The sermons are prosy, pointless, and unspiritual; the preacher is cold, formal, and unnatural; and the hearer is sleepy, uneasy, or disappointed. The hungry soul is not satisfied; the sorrowful heart is not made glad; the weary spirit is not refreshed; the conscientious doubter, or inquirer, is severely rebuked, but not helped; the poor pilgrim is commanded to shut his eyes and follow a leadership that mocks reason and slanders conscience; Sunday is gloomy, ceremonious, and irksome; creeds are fortified with texts and assumptions; and God's children are almost starved in their Father's house, because the stewards are incompetent, dishonest, or lazy. All know that the preacher is "sound in the faith," that he will utter no heresies, and that the church's position will be faithfully and scripturally defended; and therefore they can fall asleep in the pew, or remain at home and dream on the lounge, knowing the pulpit will speak only "according to the law and the testimony." Many a church is dying, because the members thereof can safely trust their minister's Orthodoxy. It is not strange that so many people have ceased to attend church; but it is strange that so many do still occupy their pews, when we consider the lifelessness and coldness of the average sermon. We think that we are perfectly justified in saying that thousands stay away from the "sanctuary," not because they do not love it, but because its services have become so perfunctory and spiritless that they neither instruct, nor inspire, nor bless the worshippers. But when our conservative preacher does not confine himself to the exposition of dogma, when he speaks from the Bible of Nature, and from the more wonderful Bible of Human Nature, and when he consecrates his reason as well as his heart to the service of God and humanity, his utterances find a lodgment in the souls of his audience, the spirit of devotion manifests its presence in the pews, the sleepers begin to "watch and pray," and the deserters one by one return to their posts of duty; yet we must not forget that the preacher's heresy is the cause of all this change, re-animation, and spirituality. He has plucked some fruit from the tree of knowledge, he has listened to the voice of God in Nature, and he has found religion in science, philosophy, and art; and if he can succeed in wearing the livery of conservatism while he preaches the gospel of liberalism, without detection, he can promote the cause of progress within the ecclesiastic fold. Such a preacher may not be altogether "a wolf in sheep's clothes," but he certainly rationalizes texts, passages, and beliefs into a tolerable conformity to our modern ideas and tendencies, and in this way he exercises a healthy influence over the superstitious, and satisfies and improves those who have not escaped the progressive spirit of our age.

We must say, however, that he lacks the honesty, manfulness, and conscience of the Nazarene preacher, who, on account of his unmistakable liberalism, "was cast out of the synagogue," and who persisted afterward in trusting to the humanity of outsiders for his daily bread, while he spent his time and strength in preaching his sublime gospel wherever he found an audience. Very often our liberal-conservative preacher, after he has eaten the forbidden fruit, made for himself an apron out of prudence and cowardice, and hidden himself among the safeties of non-committals, hears some shrewd creedist, saying: "Adam, where art thou?" He is excommunicated from his unmerciful restraints, and thrown into the creedless world where his honest convictions will be heartily welcomed, if his salary is much smaller. Some observing conservative may inform us that liberal congregations are generally small; but we have much to contend with. We have not the wealth, prestige, and popularity of the Evangelical churches; our cause has to bear the odium attached to it by misconception and uncharitableness; some people are afraid to speak out their convictions, or to join a liberal church, lest the sacerdotal Mrs. Grundy may use her influence to injure them socially or in business; very few are qualified to comprehend and appreciate the doctrines of liberalism; and it must be remembered that organized liberalism is only a few years old. We fear that too many of our liberal preachers spend so much time in proving that Orthodoxy is in error that they have scarcely any time to show how true, beautiful, and noble human nature can be made. Conventionalism, and a sectarian mannerism, and a desire to avoid everything that has the least resemblance to Evangelical opinion or action, have frequently dwarfed the progress of the liberal pulpit. When a preacher fears that it would lower his dignity to let his emotional nature manifest itself, even in the most subdued action, he should retire into the solitudes of philosophy, or into the quietudes of a literary life; for true religion is a union of reason and love, of intellect and emotion, of head and heart; and what Infinite Wisdom has joined together, let no one-sided preacher separate. Liberal people sometimes believe that they can more acceptably and profitably worship their Creator at home than in the church. They can read a good book, converse with an intelligent friend, or take a walk through the fields, or woods, or parks. There is certainly more worshipfulness in studying or admiring the works of Nature or of art than in sleeping in a pew. Still millions go to church, even when the sermons are inferior, because the songs of praise and the hallowed associations of the place conspire to lift their souls to heaven.

II. Conscience.—Owing to the general diffusion of knowledge among the masses by means of newspapers, magazines, and lectures, there is springing up a public sentiment in favor of free inquiry into every subject. The public schools are becoming the nurseries of liberal tendencies—preparing the young minds to pray for what Emerson defines as "the luxury of a religion that does not degrade." Already there is a rich harvest of progressive thought and faithful expression; and millions are outgrowing the superstition of their early training, and beseeching God and man and Nature for light, guidance, and certainty, while they are passing through the process of conversion from the law to the gospel, from credulity to faith, from a belief in miracle to a trust in law, from incarceration in dogma to religion in liberty, from the fear of God to the love of God, from the shadow to the substance, from the letter to the spirit. The converts to liberal religion, if conscientious, do not support a cause that can neither advance their spiritual interests nor command their respect; but, although they do not endorse the dogmas as the dicta of Omniscience, or even as the best statements of religious faith which man can make, or has made, yet they are deeply religious and naturally devotional, and would gladly attend a church where Deity is worshipped "in spirit and in truth," if such a church were in their neighborhood.

III. Fatigue.—In this age of competition, great numbers of people have to toil so hard during the week that they are exhausted physically and mentally, and so they are unable to attend church. Others are so busy in attending to the superfluities of modern life that they have neither time, nor force, nor a desire to unfold their higher faculties. They have devoted their lives to a fashionable animalism—a grovelling practical materialism; and their jealous god will not share their devotions with any other deity. The aims of any church in Christendom are too lofty for their comprehensions. The magnetism of a revivalist may frighten them into a concession that their aims and lives have been low; but it requires a mightier force than animal magnetism to save them from wallowing in immoralities and bestialities. They must pass through purgatorial fires, here or hereafter, before they can pray for admission into religious society. It does not seem fair to claim that, because such persons are not found in church, the church is in danger of being forsaken. We may just remark, in this connection, that any course of life that denies a man or woman a religious rest, or a few hours each week to cultivate the higher or spiritual nature of humanity, is unnatural and dehumanizing, and should be abandoned.

IV. An Increase of Sunday Recreation.—Many of those persons who are shut up in large cities during the week—in their smoke, bustle, noise, and numerous deformities of life—joyfully hail Sunday as a precious opportunity to breathe the fresh air in the parks or the fields, and to enjoy the rest and calm of Nature; but it is not true that all the sons and daughters of toil who leave the city to worship in God's creedless and inspiring temple in Nature are antipathetic to church worship. They may believe that they need the recreation, and that Nature preaches better sermons than the average preacher does. Yet the Sunday excursionist is rarely a fair representative of ennobled humanity. Too often he knows little of Nature, and can neither appreciate her beauties nor study her works; but he carries the low habits of the city with him, and enjoys degrading amusements, and returns home tired, and sinful, and foolish. Country people live in the midst of Nature's blessings every day; and Sunday gives them an opportunity, not only to worship their Creator in the church, but to renew and strengthen old friendships, and to make new ones, sometimes very dear ones. The country church has been a refiner and helper, even if we eliminate from our conceptions of it its religious character; for it causes the members to wash themselves, put on their best clothes, and meet together to cultivate their social nature. City people in the winter months and in inclement weather cannot go into the country for pleasure; and if they do not spend their Sundays at home, or go to church, they must patronize the saloon, the public library, or the art gallery. We believe that the man who attends church and works earnestly in the Sunday-school is just as healthy, as wise, as rich, as good, and as well rested as the man who "lives and moves and has his being" in the saloon. At any rate, bad preaching has not created as much misery as bad drink has. Some reformers think that museums, art galleries, and public libraries can educate, elevate, and refine humanity better than our churches can or do. Such places make very large contributions to the education, refinement, and uplifting of society; but may not the church have a mission that no other institution can fulfil? This question has not yet been settled. Besides, the church is now "common property" in town and country; but the institutions which our radical reformers propose as a substitute for the church are rarely opened on Sundays, only the larger cities have them, very few would like to spend their rest-days in them, whole families could not conveniently meet together in them, and they would soon become quite as monotonous as it is claimed church services are. It is desirable that father, mother, and children—the whole family—live, love, pray, aspire, and rejoice together, and with other families, each Sunday; and this could not be done conveniently only in a church.

At the foot of a hill, I saw a dwelling-house in ruins. I came to the hasty conclusion that its last occupants had been reduced to beggary or had gone to the poor-house; but on ascending the hill I discovered the evidences of skill and industry on the farm, and on the other side of the hill there was a large and fine house, just finished. A family was living in it. Hard work and prudence had made them rich. They had lived in the old house until they could afford to build a new one. A great deal of the material belonging to the old one was used in the construction of the new one.

To a superficial observer, the disintegration of theology, the destruction of dogmas, and the tendency to individualism, are proofs that the coming generations will not be church-goers. We should not, however, identify religion with superstition or theology. Superstition is erroneous speculation, and theology is an attempt to reconcile such speculation to the last revelation of science—to wed the ignorance of the old past to the clearest knowledge of today; but the attempt has always failed to effect a permanent union. Yet superstition was the only science which the human race in its infancy could create. In fact, our modern science is an evolution from superstition; or rather superstition is the babyhood of science. If there never had been any superstition, there never could have been a science; for science is the sum total of the knowledge which we have gained from the scrutinizing of phenomena. The savage observed phenomena as we do—he strove to guess out their meaning; and his guesses were great achievements of thought, considering his barbarous and hostile environment. He erred more or less in his attempts to analyze the causes of natural phenomena. The scientists of to-day may make mistakes. Boyle and Newton detected errors in the works of the older scientists; we know that Newton formed several false theories; and the school-girl of the twentieth century will smile at some of the absurdities of Tyndall, Huxley, Darwin, Carpenter, Wallace, Crookes, and Agassiz. The highway to the temple of truth lies through a wilderness of guesses, mistakes, and intricacies. The science of chemistry has been evolved out of alchemy, the science of astronomy has grown out of the irrationalities of astrology, and we may expect that there will soon be a weather-science to take the place of the prognostications of the old almanacs and the "Probabilities" of Mr. Myer. The great prophet of cultured materialism, Auguste Comte, teaches that the human race was theological in its infancy, metaphysical in its boyhood, and that it will be scientific in its manhood. He says that we find this to be the case in the individual. The child is a theologian, the boy a metaphysician, and the man a scientist, if properly educated. Superstition was the father of philosophy and science; but superstition was the first prayer which the infancy of the race made to the Unknown for help to solve the problems of life, a prayer that has received countless millions of answers, which answers have raised the human family to the lofty position it occupies to-day in the civilized world.

Religion, in some form or other, has always been the leader of science and philosophy. It projects itself into the future, and bids science and philosophy follow it. It does not obey the stern command of Conservatism: "Thus far shalt thou come, but no farther;" it goes farther. It is always looking out for new worlds. It prophesies about the victories of faithful efforts in every department of life. It heralds the coming light of each revelation. It is the force which moves the chariot of progress. It is believed by some that religion is a perishable superstition and that we shall soon be summoned to attend its funeral; but we see everywhere the imperishable monuments it has built and is building to human glory, and we have many proofs that it is the soul of the highest activities. Will the builder of the soul's houses and the shaper of the soul's destinies find its grave in the future? We believe in no prophecies of such a gloomy character. As the human soul outlives the destruction of several of its bodies, so religion will survive the destruction of its theologic forms. It has already created and destroyed innumerable beautiful and ugly rites and ceremonies; and at present it is picking out of the entanglements of religious thought the white threads of truth, and it will weave them into a white and seamless garment, and wear it in the holy temple which the coming man will build. Analogy, also, points to the universal enthronement of pure and true religion in the heart of man. As science has been evolved from the guess-work of savages, so religion will come forth from the speculations of theologians to sanctify the earth for the regenerated man and woman of the future. Religion has often preached inspiring sermons to the sons and daughters of earth; but the sermons have been mutilated, misconstrued, or woven into the world's traditions, and the preacher has again and again been banished or thrown into prison. Moses gave the Hebrews the decalogue, a simple and comprehensive code; but the traditionalists embellished his gospel so extravagantly that it became invisible. When the Jerusalem traditionalists asked Jesus why his disciples transgressed the traditions of the elders, he replied: "Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your traditions?" So also the sublime life of Jesus and his liberal gospel have been surrounded with tradition, fable, and conjecture; and we are asked to praise and magnify God for the surroundings of the life and gospel; but we prefer to express our gratitude only for the life and gospel. Religion is now struggling to get out of the imprisonments of the theologies and superstitions of the ages; and criticism, science, and philosophy, are rescuing their leader from the pitiless grasp of its jailers, and they will also lay the prisons in ruins. The ruins which some weep over and others rejoice over are only the ruins of sacerdotal jails, creed-walls, and theologic bulwarks. The prisoner is alive, the captive is escaping, the keepers are trembling. The new home is rising on the other and sunny side of the hill. All the true ideas and beautiful expressions of the past will be wrought into the walls of the new home. If man has no religious sentiment, no root of religion in his nature, we ask what has raised the altars and built the temples of all nations and ages? What has made the prophets and bards and martyrs of every faith? What thought out the gospels, wrote the Bibles, and incarnated itself in the songs of praise? What created the divinest ideals, and inspired men and women to pass through the fiery ordeals of the bitterest experience to actualize them? The extreme radical will answer that superstition, delusion, ignorance, priestcraft, have done all this. We answer that the spiritual nature of man, often warped, misdirected, and unhelped, but always tending upward, has done all this. We shall be told that what we call religion has burned and drowned and hanged millions on account of their religious opinions. We sorrowfully concede that the bigotry, intolerance, and passions of religionists have committed frightful outrages; and yet that is no argument against the divine nature of religion; for it would be as just to hold medical science responsible for the thousands of crimes annually committed in its name by heartless charlatans as to charge religion with all the crimes which priests have committed in its holy name. We cannot argue that, because some business men and professional men have "erred and gone astray," business and the professions must be abandoned. If our milkmen put too much water into the milk which they sell us, we cannot use this fact as an argument against the necessity of milk or of the milkman. When the Crédit Mobilier men were shown to be greater lovers of "filthy lucre" than of their country, the people did not destroy the system of government, or think that statesmen are not a necessity. Some husbands and wives live very unhappily together; yet sensible people believe that marriage is a divine institution.

The positivists believe neither in the existence of Deity nor in the doctrine of immortality; and yet they recognize the fact that each individual must have something greater than himself to worship, and that the human soul shudders at the thought of annihilation; and therefore they have expressed their belief in the necessity and continuance of public worship of some form. They have originated a system of religion, and contrived a form of public worship, that bear a great resemblance to the theology and gorgeous worship of the Church of Rome. Their Deity is the "Great Humanity," and their doctrine of immortality teaches that the race is immortal, but that the individual will never wake to consciousness after death. They are the foremost school of materialism. In this country and in Europe, they have a few congregations, worshipping according to the formule of their catechism. We refer to the Positive church only to show that the most thoughtful and cultured materialists of the age have come to the conclusion that there is something in man that seeks to express itself in some kind of public worship.

We all believe that there is a power, force, spirit, or influence, permeating, shaping, changing, modifying, moving, controlling, all things and beings. The Hindu calls this power Brahman; the Mohammedan, Allah; the Jew, Jehovah; the Saxon, God; the modern scientist, Force; and some, Nature. This power, which we prefer to name God, has given us life, thought, feeling. It has thrown us into consciousness on this planet; it is carrying us through the strange scenes of life, with or without our consent; and it will conduct us into the mysteries of the coming eternity. Scientists are only guessing at its methods of eternal action; but religion, speaking through the prophets of every century, has taught man to bend in reverence before this power and say, "Our Father." The human heart has always sought a communion with him, even when the intellect most denied him. If we believe that our common Father is the source of life, light, truth, law, love, beauty, and knowledge, and if we believe that we are indebted to him for all we have and are—for air, food, water, and clothing; for friendship, sympathy, love, mercy; for ideas and inspirations; and if we believe that all the favors which we have received from him since we were born until now have been bestowed from the purest motives—shall we not feel thankful, and express the feeling in some natural and rational way? Will not the feeling and the expression thereof be spontaneous—an outburst of soul in song or prayer, if we are in a normal condition? The expression of the feeling of gratitude to Deity, no matter what form it may assume, is devotion, or worship. Man, while he can appreciate God's gifts and while his heart is not petrified into ingratitude, will be a thinker.

As far back as history points, we find that Deity was worshipped in a collective sense, if praise, prayer, and thanks be constituents of worship. It is said that there are tribes that have no idea of God, or immortality, or heaven; and it is argued that these exceptions prove conclusively that the religious sentiment—the root of all worship—is not inherent in human nature. This is a fallacious method of argument. Every rule has its exceptions; at least, a great many have. Would it be rational for a stranger visiting a large city with hospitals and asylums to assume that all the inhabitants are sick or insane? If we see a few beggars, when we first visit a country, is that any proof that the citizens are all beggars? So, if a few tribes could be found without a religious faculty, our position is still tenable; for the human race has sung praises, made prayers, and returned thanks to its Creator for thousands of ages, and does so to-day. It has not yet been proved satisfactorily that any tribe is without the religious faculty; and if there were such a tribe, it must be in the most savage condition. Perhaps man was once in a condition that made it impossible for him to be devotional, as we understand the term. Science has not yet decided the matter. Many of our present developed faculties were, doubtless, latent at some time. The powers of the mind which make painters, poets, mathematicians, musicians, and sculptors, were rudimentary in the pre-historic man; and these powers or faculties have not been developed in many people of our own time. The organ of speech may have been imperfect in the primeval man, so that articulation was not possible.

Some hold that our senses are capable of wonderful expansion. The senses of taste, smell, and touch, could receive a greater education than they do. The sense of taste in the tea-taster is so well developed that he can detect the different teas in a mixture. Dr. Thomas Brown, the successor of Dugald Stewart in the Chair of Mental and Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, thought he had discovered a sense of weight. When we hold anything in our hands, we say it is light or heavy; but Brown theorized that the power which enables us to say so is a new sense, as he did not think the sense of feeling, or touch, was capable of informing us whether the specific gravity of a cubic inch of gold is greater or less than that of a cubic inch of silver. Other philosophers think we have the rudiments of new senses, and some think differently. Seeing is the best educated sense; yet the artist can see perfections and defects in a painting that the rest of us cannot see, because his sense of seeing is better educated than ours in that direction; but we can see a tree, or a house, or a man, as well as he. May there not be unknown powers in every sense we have? Take an individual, say a child, from any of the tribes reported to have no faculty for religion, or devotion, educate it in a religious community, and it will grow up religious and reverential. But science says you cannot bring out of human nature, or out of anything else, what is not in it. If God have placed no seed, or germ, or rudiment, or faculty, for religion in our nature, how could we be religious? But we are religious. Or how could the child of a savage be educated into a religious man? The doctrine of evolution implies that there is something to be evolved. By giving a child a religious education, you do not insert anything into its nature; you merely draw out what its Creator had implanted there. Education is not in-putting, it is out-drawing. We may be told for the thousandth time that there are fishes without eyes in the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky, that a faculty or sense, if not used, as in the case of the fishes referred to, may perish, and that, therefore, religious societies may be dispensed with. A cause that needs such a support as this kind of argument can yield is weak indeed. The fishes in the cave have rudimentary eyes, which have not been used; so the fishes are blind. If they had been placed in the proper conditions, their eyes would be useful to them. We should study how to develop the full set of our faculties; but it is folly to attempt to destroy any one of them. Hindu and Christian fanatics have furnished us with numerous examples of such folly. In the most civilized nations public worship shows no signs of decay. A few churches may be dying, yet hundreds are now in course of erection, and theologic seminaries do not seem to be decreasing. Public worship is now a fact, and there is no sign that it will not continue to be a helper and refiner of society. As to the forms which it will assume no one can prophesy; for they will be changed or modified according to the advancements and requirements of the future generations. Forms are conservative things, and will always be tenacious of life and authority; for, like old people, they claim they have a right to live and be respected, after they have done their life-work. Let us honor them for the good they have done, while we know that we belong to another age and should adopt other fashions.

Man is the only religious being within our knowledge. We believe there are higher intelligences than man, somewhere in God's infinite home, and that sometime we shall see them; but in no order of beings or animals below man is there a religious instinct. No training could make a horse, or any other animal, religious, because there is no germ in him to be developed into a religious character. If ever phrenology be accepted as a science, man's devotional nature will be able to produce another proof of its existence, as you will find by reading the works of Spurzheim, Combe, or Fowler.

The church in its highest forms has stood for universal brotherhood and self-surrender for the good of all. Freemasonry, Odd-Fellowship, and kindred societies, are founded in the belief of the fatherhood of God and in the love of the brotherhood of man; but these philanthropic societies are young when compared with the church, which has also taught that there is a sisterhood of woman. The church has clothed the naked, fed the hungry, and protected the homeless. She has built hospitals, and sent sisters of mercy, with flowers, kind words, and willing hands, to bless the inmates thereof. She has committed many sins, but she has restrained many from sinning. She has controlled the turbulent passions of men, when no other institution could do so; and in her Roman Catholic form, she is now a greater safeguard to society than all the police force of Christendom. Her mission has been a grand one. The noblest sons and daughters of earth have been born, nursed, trained, and inspired in the church. Zoroaster, Buddha, Moses, Socrates, Jesus, William Penn, George Fox, Theodore Parker, Charles Sumner, and the saintly Lucretia Mott, all came, at some time and in some way, within the reach of her influence. In some of her multitudinous forms; and if they did progress beyond her conservative limits and extend her boundaries, to the no small vexation of those who deemed themselves supernaturally "set for the defence of the gospel," still through her they received the inspiration which made them come-outers and prophets. She has been an outgrowth of the thoughts, aspirations, and necessities of fallible man; and therefore her life has not been free from error and cruelty; but, from her usefulness, progress, and spirituality in the past, and from her culture, wisdom, and influence in the present, we prophesy that she will live as long as man on this planet to encourage the arts, to spiritualize the sciences, to correct the philosophies, to restrain wild reformers from injuring society, to purify literature, to fight sin, to help her children to resist temptation, to present to the world the highest ideals of human life, to give the weary sons and daughters of toil a Sabbath, and to preach the welcome gospel of eternal life to mortals. Her spires indicate the tendency of her spirit to pierce the unknown, and to live in the glorious realities which are yet to unveil themselves to the upward gaze of man. Like her members, she believes "there is a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we may," as Shakespeare has it. We may safely trust the destiny of the church in the future to him who holds our own destinies in his hands, believing that she must become the mightiest factor of all progress and the foster-mother of all the actual and possible good there is, though often deeply hidden, in the heart of man.

The preacher of the Coming Church must live in the light, liberty, and holiness of manly thought and exalted life. On his breastplate will be written holiness of thought to God and humanity. He must be a slave of no party, school, or sect. He must utter his heart-felt convictions boldly and charitably. He will be a teacher, a prophet, or a preacher, not a priest. The sermon will be full of earnest thought,

IS A NEW REBELLION BREWING?

NEW ORLEANS, La., Jan. 21, 1875.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I do not wonder that, with all the contradictory statements from this city regarding the events of the 4th instant, you are forced to say, as you do in THE INDEX of the 14th: "This is eminently a time to keep cool and pass no snap-judgments."

If you will remain in this happy mood a short time longer, I think you will be able to separate facts from fiction with comparative ease.

You say: "If war or secret rebellion exists at the South, it is high time to know it, as armed interference with State governments is to be tolerated only in a state of war."

Possibly a brief summary of events in this State the past ten years may be of interest to you just now, and show you better than in any other way that the contest between Kellogg and McEnery sinks into insignificance, when compared with the weightier questions at issue.

As mentioned in a former letter, I have been in this city ten years, coming here from the Union army at the close of the war. My earnest wish is to see Louisiana at peace; but I must confess the prospect is not encouraging.

The effect upon my own mind of the scenes of the past ten years has been to convince me that the Southern whites and the negro can never live together in peace under a republican form of government. Yet, as you well know, I believe implicitly in republican principles, and I know of no other form of government that can be substituted. Those principles which the war made an important part of the laws of our land have never been accepted at heart by the Southern people. Sometimes I think the present generation South can never see these things as the great North and West see them.

Force, not a conviction of error, brought a surrender of the South to the North. Complete amnesty, and a shifting of the votes North last fall, have brought out in clear light the real feeling South.

In one of Von Arnim's letters to Bismarck, he says: "In spite of all our victories and our army of occupation, I cannot compel a private Frenchman to treat a German with decency." And well might Sheridan say, In spite of the surrender of 1865, and the army of occupation in this State since that time, the North has not been able to make the average Southerner treat the negro (as a free man with equal rights) with decency.

The fact is that, with little or no harmony between two races since the institution of slavery was abolished, the State of Louisiana has been no better than a vast, bloody battle-field.

From several summaries before me I select one to quote as follows:—

From 1866 to the present time there have been nine great butcheries or massacres for political reasons in the State of Louisiana. I give you the list. In 1866, 200 persons were killed, and 160 were taken wounded to the Marine Hospital, and this is not counting those dead and wounded whose bodies were carted away by the authorities and dumped in some unknown places. At that massacre, I have the authority of a surgeon in the United States army, now on duty in this city, for stating that, after these 160 wounded were taken to the Marine Hospital, the perpetrators of the massacre, standing in line on the new canal, fired volleys into the hospital itself, the marks of whose bullets were for a long time visible on the walls.

The Bossier parish massacre, in which over 300 negroes were killed and wounded; the St. Landry massacre, in which 200 were killed and wounded; the Orleans massacres, in which 63 were killed and wounded; the Caddo massacre, in which 46 were killed and wounded; the Jefferson massacre, in which 47 were killed and wounded; the St. Bernard massacre, in which 68 were killed and wounded,—all these occurred in the one year 1868.

In 1873 the Calfax massacre, in which 100 were killed and wounded; in 1874 the Coushatta massacre, in which six white men were first captured by a mob and afterward taken out and shot in cold blood. Add to these an estimate given by members of the General Assembly from the different parishes of over 1,000 persons since 1869 who have been killed for political reasons, and you have the grand total, and by no means an accurate or full one, but such as I have been able to gather hastily together of 2,190. You will observe that of these 724 were perpetrated in 1868, in the fall and summer preceding the presidential election. To these 724, which belong to the particular massacres which I have just enumerated, must be added over 300 individual murders, which occurred in that same period, making somewhere over 1,000 persons killed in 1868, and for political reasons.

It will be observed that this inhuman butchery commenced in 1866, long before the cry of thieving carpet-baggers was raised. That cry came up later in the history of Louisiana.

The very first appearance of the negro in politics was like throwing hot shot into a magazine of powder, bringing a horrible massacre one year only after the surrender. Doubtless the surrender at Appomattox by a handful of brave men was made in good faith, and some of those men have acted nobly in their efforts for a kindly coöperation of the races in politics, as well as on the plantation. But, alas, the acts of a few of the best could not, or did not, lead the rest.

The feeling against the negro in politics was deadly. The haughty Southerner had been reduced by the war to poverty. He had never been accustomed to work, and he found his gorge rising when the full force of the fact came to him that his former goods and chattels were down at the polls voting. The white man still entertained a kindly feeling for his horse, his dog, his cat, for the law had not given the right of suffrage to them. But it had given this right to the negro, placing him on an equality with his late master; and the white man, no longer having the incentive to protect the negro as valuable property, loathed him as an unclean thing. Yet under the institution of slavery there was no such repugnance. Even social equality had no terrors there, as 50,000 mixed blood, or one to every eight of pure black, at-

Deity, humanity, life, and permeated with the spirit of love and heaven; and it will expound vital themes, touch the heart, inspire the soul, create a desire to rise from one achievement of thought and action to another, and teach the precepts and explain the laws of true life. The preacher will be ordained to his mission, not by the hand of a bishop or the vote of an ecclesiastic body, but by the consent of his conscience, his general fitness for the work, and the will of heaven. He will commune with God, Nature, and man, and so be able to teach with authority and "not as the scribes." While he will not believe that he is clothed with supernatural power, yet he will "magnify his office" by his life; and he will not be esteemed a "sleeping partner" among the workers and thinkers, as he will find his true place in the noble army of bread-winners, and receive a due respect, a proper meed of praise, and just wages, because he will be a true man, a thinker, and a helper. He will press the old and the new into the service of his race, and be a "workman not needing to be ashamed, but rightly dividing the word of truth." Such a preacher will stand in the sacred desk of the future church, after God shall have "purified the sons of Levi" from cant, cowardice, and hypocrisy.

The departing church emphasized fear as a motive; the coming one will proclaim conscience as the authoritative voice of Deity in the world of action. Matter and spirit were sworn enemies in the old church; they will be good friends in the new one. God moved in fire, smoke, and thunder, in the dying church; his presence will fill the living one with a holy calmness, an uplifting devotion, and a sacred joyfulness. The ancient church had only one divine man—Buddha, Moses, Jesus, or Mohammed; the ideal one will make humanity divine. The creed church had only one holy book—Veda, Zendavesta, Koran, or Bible; the progressive one will read all the chapters which Omniscience will write for man. The conservative church worshipped a local Deity and believed in a small monotonous heaven for unthinking and credulous people; the future church will adore the Infinite, and create heaven in every human heart. The sectarian church engendered bigotry, hate, and wars; the liberal one will be established in the divine harmony of truth, wisdom, and love. In the old church, death was a dark valley, and immortality an incomprehensible dogma; in the spiritualized church, death will be a birth into unseen realities, and every soul will see its brighter mansion, whenever it looks heavenward. The Orthodox church was a mother with a whip in her hand; the coming one will be a mother with a smile on her face. The old church loved theology and superstition, and hated science and philosophy; the new one will not need the services of theology and superstition, and it will pronounce a benediction on science and philosophy and make them missionaries. The old church killed the prophets and then canonized them, and crucified the Christs and then deified and worshipped them; the humane one will find a field of labor for the prophets and Christs. The old church was in the wilderness; the coming one will glorify every mountain, hill, and valley.

The church idea is a beautiful one. On a day consecrated to rest and spiritual enjoyment, father and mother, brother and sister, husband and wife, friend and stranger, meet together on the same footing, before the same God, and for the same purpose. We are reminded of our common brotherhood and sisterhood and of the relationship which we sustain to Deity, our common Father. We are a family. The invisible hands of God are over our heads blessing us, and the unseen speaker whispers to each of us: "Love one another." The music inspires, the song touches, the prayer lifts, the reading teaches, the sermon stirs, and the sacred associations of the place calm the hearts of the worshippers.

CHURCH-GOING: ANOTHER VIEW.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I find it admitted, in the paper entitled "Worship in the Nineteenth Century," that the author—whose beautiful spirit and fine thought we all admire—differs from the judgment of "not a few persons of intelligence and virtue." May I suggest a reason for holding an opinion quite opposite from Mr. Potter's?

Decrease of church-attendance is an established and admitted fact. This decrease is largely among the great middle class, who do the hard working and hard thinking of the present age. The most robust thought upon social life is found not at the foot nor at the top of the hill, but among the struggling climbers. Church-going is still in vogue. The rich and the fashionable—those who value appearances—all go regularly to church. Also the ignorant and superstitious go to church. Those who think for themselves, and then act as they think, are the people who do not go to church. And these people form the steady, valuable, reliable substratum of society. They are acting in opposition to the authorized prejudices of the times. They have a reason for such action. It is that the regular church services do not give the aid needed in the strong, earnest effort of daily life. That struggle lacks an element that the services of our churches not only do not, but, I believe, cannot give.

Mr. Potter defines worship as "an expression of man's sense of relation to a mysterious sovereignty in the universe beyond himself." In all expression of feeling there are two methods, form and action, or barren acts and fertile acts—acts that are merely a personal gratification and acts that aim at, if they do not accomplish, some good thing, some betterment of humanity. Church services are more and more of the former class. All sensuous delights of eye and ear are cultivated in the church surroundings. Religious sentiment is not strengthened but weakened by them.

To retain its force and integrity every feeling must be expressed in earnest action toward some end. To retain grace and symmetry it should also find expression in forms; but feeling whose expression is limited to forms is false and worthless, and feeling whose expression is chiefly through forms is fast becoming so.

Compare the churches of to-day: Is there more "spiritual inertness" in the plain and unadorned Quaker meeting-house than in the cushioned, carpeted, and colored churches where operatic music and undoubted eloquence prevail? A good discourse, call it a sermon or call it a lecture, on any of the living movements of reform is not wanting for enthusiastic appreciation and numbers of hearers. But in this day of general education and intelligence the standard of excellence is placed high, and few ministers can command admiration for weekly discourses, with none of the old superstitious reverence for the holy office to cloud the intellects and dim the eyes that judge. In these days "a church cannot live on emotions." "A religion without thought is emasculated, and must dwindle to decay." "If religious emotion does not issue in good works, it proves itself of little worth, and to many souls it doubtless operates as a delusion and a snare." In these three sentences we have the key of the whole subject. There must be religious feeling, but I aver that no true and virile religious feeling is born of pictures and music, or any sensuous pleasure; there must be thought to guide and direct wisely the expression of this feeling; and then from the union of these two must be born effort clothed in action to complete the trinity of thorough religious living. As our nature is threefold,—emotional, intellectual, and physical,—so must our virtue be a virtue of good impulse, good thought, and good action. Mr. Potter stops just short of the last. True, he urges morality, but morality is coming to be understood as a negative term signifying doing no wrong. It is not enough to be moral. We must move on; we must do something for the betterment of humanity; not mere amelioration, binding up a sore here and giving a loaf there. This insatiable monster of general intelligence demands not amelioration, but prevention of evils. Our impulses die for want of propagation in acts. Intellect, the great idol of the present, though most valuable to human progress, is least important to human integrity. If not continually humiliated by the errors of action, it grows arrogant in its self-sufficiency, checks too hardly the natural impulses, and so undermines integrity.

Encouragement of individual feeling, thought, and action is what we need. The strength to speak, to act, to live differently from other people, from moral conviction, is what we crave. What courage, what bravery, what strength is gleaned from the fair walls, the sweet sounds, the soothing religious platitudes of the churches? To-day, when newspapers, telegraphs, and railroads conspire to overwhelm us with petty details of how other folks feel, think, and act, what help from the churches have we to resist these moulding and forming influences, and to dare base our life on some noble purpose for others, instead of the continual and ubiquitous struggle to "get on," and in old age be rich and comfortable? Church-going does sometimes help the "getting on" in life; but what active worker for the good of humanity found his inspiration in churches? Did Garrison? Did Sumner? No; church services signally failed to meet the needs of active life. Therefore is church attendance on the decline. It will continue to be so until the great religious war now gathering—be it a war of words or a war of swords—is decided. And after that, I hope experience will have suggested a new and better way to cultivate religious living than any church service that now vainly essays that work.

In closing, I cannot but repeat the quotation from Goethe made by Mr. Frothingham in his paper on "Spiritual Force and its Supply": "There are three worships—worship of that which is above us; worship of that which is on a level with us; and worship of that which is below us; and the last is the highest of the three." Mankind has pretty generally outgrown the first worship; education is undermining it. We are entered on the era of worship for that which is on a level with us. And some few minds are soaring onward to worship that which is below, though the era of such a general worship is far in the future. The worship of the nineteenth century must be classed as in the second stage, the worship of human possibility and power, expressed in the urgency of intellectual culture and education, by which alone man's powers are fully utilized and man's progress chiefly promoted. It will require some experience of each worship to truly and justly establish the relations of man's threefold nature. The simplest life offers something of each. It comes in the child's reverence for parents, the lover's reverence for the chosen beloved, and the parent's reverence for the tender child, always wonderful and uncomprehended in its sweet unconsciousness and unwisdom.

In this age we study social problems; we train intellects that they may study; we incite them to application that we may learn; we devote our lives; therefore we worship. There is no stronger expression of "sense of relation to a sovereign mystery" than the effort to learn and understand concerning it; therefore we worship through the great church service of social science, humanity, its powers and possibilities.

LEXINGTON, Mass., Jan. 23, 1875.

An English clergyman exclaimed in a company of his fellow-preachers, "Ah, well! there is only one thing in our ministrations more trying to me than preaching." "Indeed," they said, "and what may that be?" "Hearing any one else preach," he replied.

test. But enough; let us return to the summary of events.

Referring to the effect upon the colored voters of the bloodshed up to the fall of 1868, the record reads: "Now mark the result. The day of election in 1868 was as peaceable and quiet an election day as ever occurred in this country. Yet in the parish of Orleans, where there were from 13,000 to 16,000 registered Republican voters, the total vote for the Republican national ticket was but 270."

Twenty-two parishes are then enumerated at length, the registered voters and the votes being given in each parish with this result: "The net result of the Democratic and White Camelia campaign of 1868 was that, out of 36,278 Republican voters in twenty-two parishes of the State, through the intimidation, fear, and terrorism resulting from the massacres before mentioned, only 1,118 Republican votes were allowed to be deposited for the Republican national ticket."

Let those who regard Returning Boards with disfavor (and I confess that I am one) mark the following:—

These facts were the origin and the cause of the peculiar election laws of this State, sometimes styled by our White League friends "infamous." They have, however, no word of similar reprobation for the massacres which made their enactment necessary. These massacres, in which riots were substituted for elections, are what made a Returning Board right and necessary.

I will now quote more at length from the summary before me:—

These facts have been officially proven before a committee of the General Assembly, and before two congressional committees. They are not denied. They have been notorious for years. Now when General Sheridan characterizes the perpetrators of similar deeds of atrocity in 1874 as "banditti," the Chamber of Commerce, the Board of Trade, the Cotton Exchange, the City Council, the bodies of merchants and a part of the clergy, assemble and pass indignant resolutions, denouncing his statements as untrue. Let me ask the Chamber of Commerce, the Board of Trade, and these other indignant mercantile and theological bodies a question: Gentlemen, did you ever call one single meeting to denounce these massacres? Did you ever denounce them in public or private? Were you afraid? Did your press denounce them, or did it not try to conceal or apologize for them? Were they afraid? And did not a part of your press boldly justify them? France had one great massacre—St. Bartholomew—and ever since, for hundreds of years, the black cloud of its memory has darkened the fame of that nation. And her savants, her clergy, her business men, her statesmen, have solemnly, before the world, denounced the horrid crime. England had her massacre in the obscure Scotch valley of Glencoe. One hundred persons were murdered. England, up to the day of Macaulay, 200 years afterward, kept repenting for and denouncing her crime before the civilized world. Macaulay has crystallized her repentance in the tearful and indignant confession and rebuke of his immortal history. Louisiana has had nine massacres in eight years, all of them as atrocious as St. Bartholomew; most of them bloodier and with more victims than Glencoe. Gentlemen, merchants and clergy of New Orleans, when did you ever call a meeting to denounce these horrid crimes? Are you afraid?

And yet you denounce Sheridan as being untrue in his statements. What is untrue? That these atrocities were committed? You dare not say that! That the men who committed them are banditti? You dare not say that! That you have kept silence and refused to condemn them in the same manner that you were so swift to condemn Sheridan? You dare not say that!

The Democratic and White League campaign of 1874 was a second edition of the White Camelia campaign of 1868. It opened by an organized, systematic plan, commenced simultaneously throughout the State, for ejecting by violence from their positions the lawfully appointed or elected parish officials, and substituting in their places the so-called McEnery officials. The opening act of this novel political campaign was the capture by a mob, of six men, officials of Lincoln parish, two of whom held appointments under the United States, and their murder in cold blood. Not a solitary conservative newspaper in this State has denounced this atrocity, while several of them have boldly and repeatedly applauded and endorsed it. Advice of the most sanguinary character and the most revolutionary lawlessness was given from week to week in the columns of the principal newspapers of the State. The Picayune, on the 16th of September, advised that any white man found addressing colored people as I am addressing you should be "shot down like a dog in his tracks." The Bulletin threatened United States soldiers and officers with torn uniforms and punched heads should they interfere with the White Leagues in their operations, and quoted with approval the resistance to United States troops in Tennessee. The Shreveport Times advocated over and over the murder of every Republican official who should be found elected by the returning officers against the decrees of the White Leagues; and its chief proprietor recently in this city, before the congressional committee itself, openly and boldly stated that such had been his advice, and would continue to be his advice, and that he thought the murders would be committed. Threats of assassination of the Governor, of the returning officers, and of various leaders of the Republican party, were made openly throughout the summer in the newspapers and on the streets, in the hotels and in all places of public resort. Finally, the White League conspiracy culminated in the bloody insurrection of September 14, which for a moment overpowered the State government, and which, next to the Coushatta massacre, had the most powerful influence throughout the whole State in intimidating and deterring negroes from voting.

I come now to the special function of the White League conspiracy in controlling the late election. The White League organization is a semi-military, semi-political society. It is also a confederated organization, being in sympathy, cooperation, and correspondence with organizations of a similar character in the other reconstructed States of the South. Its objective point in all these States is the overthrow of the reconstructed governments as based upon negro suffrage.

Finally, I charge that in the White League Coushatta campaign of 1874, in its assassinations and massacres, in the tone of its press, in its war upon negro children in the schools, in their proposition for restoring star cars, and in the thoroughly proscriptive, vindictive, and revengeful spirit which they have reawakened in the people, and heightened to a fury never known before, the white people of this State have more completely repudiated every principle they professed, and every promise they made in 1872, than was ever done by any political party in the history of the world before. In 1872 they had adopted Greeley and his platform of peace and conciliation and the recognition of the legitimate results of reconstruction. In their adoption of the Liberal platform they more expressly and specifically repudiated themselves to these principles. In the speeches of all their orators, in the resolutions of all their meetings, and in the professions of all their newspapers, they again and again iterated and reiterated these same principles. There is not a single one of these principles that they have not abandoned, repudiated, condemned, and put under the ban of a terrible proscription by their course for the last eighteen months.

The massacre of 1868 led to reconstruction; the massacres of 1868 led to the election laws, and the enforcement acts of Congress; the massacre of Colfax in 1873 sent a chill over the wave of sympathy, which was rising at the North for us, and in my opinion defeated Mr. Carpenter's bill for a new election; and the massacre at Coushatta, and the White League campaign of 1874, with the riot of September 14, ending in the revolutionary attempt to overthrow the State government on January 4, have undone all that the Liberal and Conservative men of both parties sought to accomplish in 1872, and have brought the State to the brink of war and desolation.

In the returning sense of the country of the true situation here, and in the continued ascendancy of Republican principles, rests our only hope for salvation from a reign of terror under the second Confederacy, equal in violence to that of the first Confederacy of 1860.

Is it not time for those who have supposed that the present disordered condition of Louisiana is due simply to the contest between Kellogg and McEnery, and the alleged usurpation of the former, to look at the fact that these disturbances commenced nine years ago?

The cry has been of late, "thieves, bad legislation," etc. No honest Republican will seek to cover or palliate the acts of bad men in office, although the affliction is not confined to Louisiana. Let thieving carpet-baggers suffer the merited rebuke of honest Republicans North and West; but don't, because of the acts of a few bad men, turn the whole State and four hundred thousand negroes over to the tender mercies of those who have no sympathy with the fundamental principles of republican government. They might make immaculate legislators, although the record of the Slidell Legislature before the war, as well as the coup d'état of the Wiltz wing of the present Legislature, does not inspire me with much enthusiasm in that direction. To this must be added the lamentable fact that some of "the oldest and the best of Louisiana's sons" were mixed up in the carpet-bag legislation so much complained of. Must the record of the past ten years be repeated? Must civil rights continue to wade through seas of blood? Shall this half-enforcement of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution go on? Either a vigorous course, or a repeal of those laws, and the surrender of the negroes to the whites, should be the next move. If those amendments are to be enforced, nothing but a military government will do it.

Two days ago the Associated Press despatches gave us the following from the London Times, editorial:—

In the gloom surrounding us, one thing is perceptible: all men are arming; Germany is arming en masse and surrounding nations; the best part of the world cannot do otherwise; the momentary dreams of peace have fled away. Germany recognizes the stern necessity. What she won by arms, she can only hold by arms, and while arms are in her hands.

And must the Republic of the United States do the same to give effect to those laws which I claim are virtually a dead letter in this State? Or shall those laws be repealed? It is this last that the Southerners hope for. They predict the fall of this Republic in two years. They declare that the voting North points all this way. They predict, and certain New York papers join them, in the ascendancy of a party utterly opposed to the principles upon which the war was fought. If this prediction should prove to be true (and the hope of it is what gives vitality to every White League organization), it will simply show that a majority of the people North have reconsidered and gone back upon the ideas and principles which led them to prosecute the late war. Its immediate effect would be a reversal of legislation regarding equal rights, a virtual surrender of the results of the war, a triumph of the South, and recovery of the lost cause. Shall the South, encouraged by their friends North, effect this?

It would be a bitter fact for many to accept, that the war was a failure, and that the life and treasure freely given but ten years ago were worse than useless.

This is a blue letter. Perhaps you can draw a brighter picture. But I will venture to say that, were you here, you could not write other than as I have done this evening.

W. F. P.

In a Bavarian town of the most pronounced Catholic Orthodoxy, relates a South German paper, a priest preached lately against the Old Catholics, and in the course of his address said: "The Old Catholics are so vile that they will all be cast into the pit, and if what I tell you is not true, may the devil take me now on the spot!" Just then he knocked his book off the desk, and an American sitting near with a negro servant told the latter to return the book to the priest, who, perhaps, had never seen one of those sons of Ham in his life. The negro at once obeyed, and as he mounted the lowest of the pulpit steps the clergyman repeated his wish that the devil might come and take him if what he had said against the Old Catholics was not true. Although the negro went softly, the preacher heard his footsteps, and, turning round, saw a black object solemnly, steadily, and surely approaching him. He looked at him with terror, and believing that he would be the next instant collared by his Satanic Majesty, he cried out, with trembling voice, "It is, after all, possible that there may be good people among the Old Catholics." Turning then round to see if the object had disappeared, he saw it still steadily approaching. The perspiration burst out on his brow, and full of despair he called out, "There are even many good people among the Old Catholics!" Thinking that this would suffice, he turned round, but what was his horror to find that the object was close at hand. Imagining himself in the very grasp of Beelzebub, turning partly to the negro and partly to the congregation, he cried out, "May the devil come and take me if all the Old Catholics are not better than we are!" The terrified priest fainted from the fright.—Advertiser.

GOD'S LOVE.

He loves me well!
And such a spell
Of joy the thought flings o'er me,
I cannot see
That there should be
Despair in aught before me.

So let me wake
From dreams, and take
The staff he lays beside me,
And, trying still
To work his will,
Be sure that he will guide me.

I am at home:
I do not roam
An exile through illusion,—
With gifts my God
The very sod
Has strewn in rich profusion.

To him I cried,
Himself to hide
No more from my beholding;
And, lo! his arm
I saw, from harm
The whole creation folding.

Like babes that rest
On mother's breast,
With confidence grown bolder,
We slowly rise
To meet his eyes,
Or fall upon his shoulder.

GOODNESS.

Thought, mighty thought, is struggling now;
Hearts young and old beat with its power;
The hand that soothes the throbbing brow
Points also to the coming hour—
The hour that lifts the darkened veil
From off the eyes that long have slept,
And gives to man the earth-born right
That priestly cunning long has kept.

Hail, blessed day of love and light!
Be thy bright banner now unfurled;
Sweet Goodness! lift the pendant high,
And wave it o'er a restless world.
Thy power alone can make us free,
Thou wilt supply our every need;
Sweet Goodness, Love, and Charity!
Thou art to us a sacred creed.

THE COMPLETE Theological Works of Thomas Paine have just been republished by J. P. Mendum in a single octavo volume of about four hundred pages, embracing the Age of Reason and various minor works. The issue of the book is very timely, as the erection and dedication of a stately building in Boston to the memory of Thomas Paine have excited fresh curiosity to know what the writings were which have been so bitterly attacked by the clergy and so stoutly defended and signally honored by their opponents.

CAPTAIN J. A. FREMONT, keeper of the Parish Prison of Orleans, Louisiana, which is the prison for the city of New Orleans, has just published a statement in reply to Sheridan that the total number of prisoners confined there for murder is 72, of whom 17 only are white Conservatives, while 24 are white, and 31 are colored, Radicals. On this statement Mrs. Cheney sends us the following acute criticism: "We have never understood that the complaint of the Radicals was that there are too many murderers in prison in Louisiana, but too many out of it who ought to be there." That is precisely the trouble.

MR. JOHN ALBEE, of Washington, sends this "squib" for our "woman's rights corner":—

WOMAN'S LOGIC.

Vainly I plead my cause with Portia for my judge,
Though all the logic mine and all the precedents:
When her beloved Milo speaks, my words are fudge—
For woman weighs the man and not the arguments.

If any brilliant woman is stung to retaliate for this saucy epigram on "Woman's Logic" by sending us an equally saucy epigram on "Man's Conceit," the imperturbable INDEX will with all demureness and impartiality put it in its "man's rights corner." Seriously, when we find men ignoring the reasons we offer for our anti-Christian position and regarding it as a mere matter of "temperament," we see that it is by no means an exclusively feminine trait to "weigh the man and not the arguments."

A SOCIAL "NEST OF SNAKES."

Dr. Harris, of New York, has recently given to the public some of the most curious and instructive criminal statistics ever published. Not long ago his attention was called to the fact that a county on the upper Hudson exhibited a very unusual proportion of criminals and paupers to the whole population, 480 out of its 40,000 inhabitants being in the almshouse. Examination of the records made evident a constant recurrence of certain names, which indicated that certain families contributed most of the persons thus thrown upon the public for support. Dr. Harris became so much interested in the matter that he made a thorough investigation into the genealogies of these families, and reached results of a most remarkable character.

It appears that about seventy years ago a young girl named "Margaret" was left adrift in a village of the county, nobody remembers how; but, as there was no almshouse then in the county, it is sufficiently evident that the public neglected her altogether, and left her to grow up as best she could. This neglect on the part of the public, however, entailed a fearful retribution on itself. From this girl have descended two hundred criminals! In one generation of her unhappy line there were twenty children, three of whom died in infancy and seventeen grew to maturity. Of the seventeen survivors, nine served out sentences for high crimes in the State prisons amounting in the aggregate to fifty years; the eight others were frequent inmates of almshouses, jails, and penitentiaries. The total number of Margaret's descendants, through six generations, is nine hundred; and this small army, besides furnishing the two hundred convicted criminals already mentioned, have been in the main "idiots, imbeciles, drunkards, lunatics, prostitutes, and paupers." What a terrible revenge has Nature inflicted on society for its original contempt of the obligations of humanity towards the poor little waif "Margaret"!

Doubtless an extreme case like the above cannot easily be paralleled elsewhere; yet it illustrates none the less the working of a universal and inexorable law. The human race is one immense social organism, and comes under the principle laid down by Kant that in every organism the whole and the parts are mutually means and ends. On the one hand, the true end of the individual is the highest welfare of the race; on the other hand, the true end of the race is the highest welfare of the individual—of all the individuals composing it. Until this mutual self-dedication of the part to the whole and of the whole to the part has become the perfectly comprehended and universally obeyed law of all human existence, there must continue to be in the world a vast amount of avoidable pain, misery, and degradation. It is the great law of HUMAN SOLIDARITY, which is involved in the very constitution of human nature; and human nature is itself part of cosmical or universal Nature. Sociology can never attain the rank of a true science until these truths are recognized as its first principles.

Believing this, we have not a particle of sympathy with any theory of individualism which leaves out of sight the sacred mutual obligations existing between the individual and society. What do people usually mean when they say that So-and-so is "in society"? Merely that So-and-so is a member of a petty fashionable clique of persons who assume to be "society" in a worldly sense, just as a petty Christian clique assume to be the Church of God, or "society" in a religious sense. The humanitarian must feel as profound a contempt for the one assumption as for the other. Show us a man, woman, or child that is "out of society," and we will make a bonfire of all our writings from the day we first set pen to paper. Doubtless poor "Margaret" was never once thought of in her day as being "in society"; she was an outcast, excluded, neglected, despised. Yet the fearful story of her influence on society set forth by Dr. Harris is the proof that she was "in society" a thousand times more powerfully than most of those who disdained even so much as to speak to her. If the "society" that so quietly voted her out of itself had known that it might as wisely have voted her off the planet or out of the solar system,—if it had been aware of its own responsibility for the care of this helpless creature, and had discharged faithfully the duty it owed to her,—would it not have escaped its present enormous burden of supporting a thousand paupers and criminals, more or less? Yet the same policy is continued to-day towards vast multitudes of such outcasts, with the certainty that the same results will follow hereafter.

"But what is to be done?"

A great deal more than any individual, or any number of individuals as such, can ever accomplish. Society as a whole must recognize not only the duty, but also the imperative necessity, of rescuing pauper children from the inexorable fate which awaits them, if they are suffered to grow up in pauperism. It will take the combined efforts and resources of the whole State to apply the only remedy. No matter what it costs, the cheapest course in the end will be that which insists on educating and fitting for a useful career every child born into the community. Property will at last discover its own interest in this matter; but the best and wisest already recognize the duty of caring for the now neglected classes. They acknowledge the obligations imposed by the law of human solidarity, and advocate as a matter of public morality what property-owners will eventually advocate as a matter of public interest. Whatever poisons the blood of the social organism becomes a subject of universal concern; and the day will undoubtedly come when social diseases shall be treated by skilled physicians rather than, as now, by quacks and charlatans. That a part of their treatment, at least, will be the requisition that every child shall be educated, whether the parents do or do not neglect their natural duties, and that no child shall be suffered to be brought up in a hotbed of crime and pauperism, we have no doubt whatever. The wretched "Margarets" of the future will not be abandoned to their fate, to become mothers of desperadoes and imbeciles by the score, but rescued betimes from the influences that predestine them to ruin, unless counteracted by better ones. May the day come speedily when social science and natural ethics, reduced to practice, shall render impossible such dreary histories as that which Dr. Harris has dragged before the dismayed public!

WHAT SHALL BE THE NUCLEUS?

The discussion which has been going on in some of the religious papers in regard to the reunion of the Trinitarian and Unitarian Congregational bodies has been the occasion of several noteworthy articles. Among these none is more worthy of note than a leading editorial in the Liberal Christian of Jan. 9th, under the caption, "Union of all Congregationalists." The article is remarkable for its breadth of view, for its keenness of observation, for its unsectarian candor and impartiality, for its concessions to liberal thought, and for its large and generous spirit of fellowship. It is an article that in itself should attract attention. But it is especially noteworthy from its position as the prominent leader in a paper of which Dr. Bellows is the editor. Whether he is the author of the article or not, it is to be assumed that he gave it his assent.

To give a brief hint of the argument: the article begins by speaking of the natural tendencies to union that exist among all Congregationalists, considering it "certain that, before the New Year of the twentieth century comes, all the more religious and earnest men of the Congregational bodies will have come into some practical coöperation." "If the Congregational Council [Orthodox] ceases to be dogmatic, and the Free Religious Association continues to be religious, even they will have found a basis of cordial agreement and coöperation."

The writer then proceeds to inquire what shall be the centre of attraction, or the tertium quid, for effecting this fellowship. And here is where the candor and liberality of the article are especially displayed. It might naturally be expected that a Unitarian would say that the Unitarian body must be this attracting nucleus, since it stands midway between the extremes that are to be drawn together. That is what a sectarian Unitarian would be most likely to say. But the writer has too clear an insight into modern religious tendencies to say this. He sees that the three bodies named, so far as they have any vital contribution to make towards the coming union, represent motion on converging lines towards a common point of attraction, and asserts that in neither body, as it exists at present, is this centre of attraction to be found. Orthodox Congregationalism cannot furnish the centre of the coming religious unity, because it is still too much "hampered by dogma," and does not allow the necessary "freedom of motion." Unitarian Congregationalism once gave more hope of furnishing it, "but that hope with the present tendency has less justification." "For the present it is too much intent upon its boundary": for the writer says, applying an astronomical illustration previously used in the article in explaining the law of religious organization and fellowship, "no nebula which defined its boundaries by excision of its contents ever became a star." The Free Religious Association, he thinks, is equally incapacitated for furnishing the centre of attraction, because it simply provides "a platform for free discussion." It may contribute towards the coming religious unity by "educating the people to a love of liberty and the practice of it," but it fails as a "centre of organization."

Still the writer finds in all these bodies the vital elements of the new religious union that is to be. And he indicates his own idea of the "centre of attraction" whence the organizing power is to come, by the following paragraph: "We heartily and joyfully believe that what the 'dogma,' the 'boundary,' and the 'platform' cannot do, the heart of Christian charity can. Whatever body of religious men and women are able and willing to obey the impulse which drives them in pursuit of goodness and truth, and will allow no other force to dominate, will have found the way to the central forces which shall yet shape a world in which righteousness shall be the attraction of cohesion."

Such a word as this in a denominational paper of Christendom is, indeed, a sign of the times; and it cannot but be most cordially welcomed by all lovers of religious liberty and by all who believe in a possible religious fellowship on the basis of liberty. What is there said of the Free Religious Association would probably be accepted in the main by the members of that Association, as a just characterization of at least its present position and aims in respect to the practical work of organization. That Association has not attempted to organize the coming religion or the coming church. It has not offered itself even as the centre of a general organization. It has studiously refrained from anything that would seem like a new form of ecclesiastical manipulation. Though sometimes urged to take up the work of local organization it has thus far declined to do so. It has been content to be an educating force in behalf of the principles of religious liberty and fellowship, and then to let these principles crystallize into such organizations as should be natural and legitimate to them.

At the same time (though of course I am only speaking as one individual) I think the members of the Free Religious Association generally would recognize in the closing sentence above quoted a very accurate expression of the organizing centre of the Association itself. To lead men and women "to obey the impulse which drives them in pursuit of goodness and truth," to remove such obstructions as dogmatism, superstition, and sectarianism throw in the way of this impulse, so that the pure impulse to truth and goodness may "dominate" all other forces—this is the one controlling aim, in my view, of that organization. Perhaps the phrase "Christian charity," in the preceding sentence, was meant by the writer to indicate a peculiar spiritual quality in this impelling force, though for aught that appears elsewhere in the article "human charity" would be a phrase quite as true to his thought, and more consistent with the breadth of his aim. Whenever and wherever the human impulse to truth and goodness, without any ecclesiastical label and freed from ecclesiastical restraint, becomes the dominating force in life, then and there the coming religious fellowship will have found its central attraction. Whether, however, this new centre of union will evolve some one grand external organization, corresponding, for instance, to the Church of Rome, is more than doubtful. More likely the new religious forces will organize themselves in social and individual life, with only such local organizations and appliances as are called forth by local exigencies and demands, and such opportunities for general intercourse and fellowship as free minds, seeking the same general ends, will crave and supply.

MR. HARRIS ON EDUCATION.

Mr. William T. Harris, of St. Louis, has again made a noteworthy contribution to the cause of education in his address delivered before the State Teachers' Association at Jefferson City, Mo., December 31. His subject was the relation of common schools to high schools and colleges. The striking feature of Mr. Harris' writings on education is the breadth of view with which he regards all the topics of education. It is with him a matter of large national concern; nay, more,—a matter of human necessity and interest; and his programme of studies considers the whole nature and circumstances of the pupil, in relation to the present development of civilization.

We cannot forbear contrasting his utterances with those of his great fellow-citizen, Mr. Schurz, who spoke in Boston so recently. Instead of a broad, statesmanlike view of the questions of national education, which we wished to hear discussed by a legislator of Mr. Schurz's undoubted high qualifications, we had the old platitudes in regard to woman's education for marriage, home duties, etc.; while from Mr. Harris we have a broad, clear outlook on the whole relation of the school to the State as well as to individual welfare.

He treats with especial power the subject of the mutual relations of classic and scientific study, showing how the one puts the student in possession of the facts of mental growth and development, and makes him kin to all the achievements of civilization, while the other gives him a perpetually increasing insight into the great organic laws of Nature. These two elements of education, he claims, should go hand in hand through the whole course of education. Even in the nursery, the child's fairy stories lead him into communion with the mythology of the remotest ages; while the training of his senses is putting him into possession of the forces of the outer world.

In this constant relation he finds the corrective for the tendency of the pursuit of natural science to destroy the sense of human and divine personality, and to lessen the consciousness of free-will and individual responsibility. He considers the inner facts of consciousness, and the traditions of history, to be as legitimate subjects of scientific study as the histories written in the rocks, and the affinities revealed by chemistry.

It is to the university, enlarged in its methods and brought into close relation with the common school system, that he looks to hold with even hand the scales between these two opposing but not irreconcilable tendencies of thought, and to secure our future development against practical materialism, on one side, and a reaction to superstition and religious intolerance, on the other.

FREE-THOUGHT NOTES.

BY A VETERAN ENGLISH FREE-THINKER.

There was a period, ranging from 1840 to about 1846, when the Socialist disciples of Robert Owen were mostly alarmed by the unpleasant proceedings of the Bishop of Exeter against them. His speeches in the House of Lords, demanding the interference of the Socialists to put them down, obliged Mr. William Pare, the most eminent of the missionaries among them, who held the Office of Registrar of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in the town of Birmingham, to resign. The clerical pressure in the town otherwise led to his dismissal. Many gentlemen publicly known to be favorable to the Socialism of the time found things made threatening in their connections. Then a reaction set in against the continuance of anti-theological discussion in the social body. It never had any proper place in it. It was always irrelevant, but it had been openly encouraged by Mr. Owen, by his son Robert Dale, by the editor of the New Moral World, the organ of the society, and all the missionaries, who were to a man inclined to vex the clerical mind, which certainly left them no rest and gave them no quarter. But on the appearance of the Bishop of Exeter, the society came to the wise conclusion of observing neutrality with regard to the clergy, but not providing for the necessary expression of the free-thought conviction in their ranks in a separate way, in which the responsibility was removed from the social directors to those who individually took part in it. They took the unwise course of denouncing it altogether. The clerical public were delighted to see them denouncing what they had hitherto applauded and participated in; and, where they enforced compliance among their missionaries, their new behavior looked to the public like cowardice. Some of their leading missionaries, as Mr. Lloyd Jones and Robert Buchanan, father of the poet of that name, took oaths as licensed preachers of the gospel to qualify them for speaking in the public halls of the party without prosecution. Mr. Buchanan showed an honorable reluctance to comply with this ceremony. The old narrative, with all its details of historic interest, I have given in my History of Coöperation, which, as you are aware, is in the press.

THE ORIGIN OF "SECULARISM."

This explanation is necessary to explain the origin of the new party of free-thinkers which arose at that time, and ultimately adopted that new form of free-thought which has since been known as Secularism. Mr. Watson, whose death I mentioned in my last, his coadjutors, Henry Hetherington, John Cleave, London radical publishers, Abel Heywood, of Manchester, who was sometime since the candidate for the representation of that city, and had a great and well-earned following of electors there, and many other publishers throughout the country, who were all imprisoned for their intrepidity in issuing free-thought works, constituted, together with the Socialist party under Robert Owen, the band of old free-thinkers who continued the work of Richard Carlile and Robert Taylor, and who maintained the right of free-thought, free discussion, free publication of opinion, without much caring what the opinion was, or making any attempt to organize the expression of it.

PERSECUTION OF THE "SECULARISTS."

The Socialist reaction of timidity occasioned a revolt among those missionaries who thought that the courage of free-thought was compromised by this mode of suppression which I have described. Foremost of these was Charles Southwell, a man of daring and dramatic ability, William Chilton, a Bristol printer, and Maltus Questell Ryall, the most accomplished iconoclast—original, fiery, always gentlemanly—whom agitation in this century has produced; Mrs. Emma Martin, a handsome and keen-witted lecturer who never lost her womanliness on the platform; myself, Thomas Paterson, who shrank from no consequences of his coöperation, and Miss Matilda Roalfe, who ought to have been mentioned earlier, and whose courage and services were considerable. Most of us were imprisoned—I who took Mr. Southwell's place as editor of the Oracle of Reason during his incarceration, and Mr. Paterson also. Three editors of the Oracle of Reason were in prison at the time. I was delivering a lecture on "Home Colonization." I did not transgress the limits of neutrality. The judge who tried me admitted this. After the lecture, I was questioned about my personal opinions on religion; I answered frankly. When my imprisonment came, Mr. Owen, although I was one of his social missionaries, never took the slightest notice of me. The editor of the organ which represented my party, the New Moral World, ignored me altogether, so timorous were they of any identification with the free-thought they had so gallantly advocated.

ESTABLISHMENT OF "THE REASONER."

Thus the new party of free-thinkers was founded. So long as persecution lasted, we thought it sufficient to maintain the right of free discussion. Afterwards we applied ourselves to the organization of free-thought. The Reasoner, which I conducted during thirty annual volumes, early took for its militant motto these words:—

"They who believe that they have truth, ask no favor save that of being heard; they dare the judgment of mankind. Refused coöperation, they invoke opposition; for opposition is their opportunity."

We continued this until the clergy, believing what we said, withdrew all opposition whatever. In religious tracts and the pulpit, they were not complimentary to us; but for twenty years no respectable or representative advocate of Christianity came forward to oppose us. They believed we should die out if left alone. They reasoned as the head of an army might, that it was best to leave the few open adversaries alone. To engage with them gave them importance, and attracted numerous people to their side who are accustomed to befriend a smaller party. For fifty years the policy of the Church of England has been one of silence, and for twenty years the dissenters have followed it, until they have found the open country has been silently filled with adversaries created by writers, by the press, by science, by reason,—the progress which comes by time,—until Mr. Gladstone, two years ago, with an intrepidity of reproach which must have been heard by prelates and preachers with dismay, said to the students of the Liverpool College:—

"I wish to place on record my conviction that belief cannot now be defended by reticence any more than by railing, or by any privileges and assumption. . . . We commit a fatal error if we allow this to become a merely professional question. It is the affair of all."

Since these words were spoken, battle has been given on both sides, and we are all in the midst of it now.

BISHOP COLENSO.

It came to pass, as you have no doubt heard, that Bishop Colenso did not speak at Westminster Abbey. That was no fault of the intrepid and liberal Dean, who did invite him, and told the Bishop of London so in the best ecclesiastical letter which has appeared for many years in England. It was a noble vindication of the Bishop of Natal, and also of his own intentions in inviting him. No reply from the Bishop has been made public, and it is unknown what he thought of the intrepid and independent Dean. Bishop Colenso, with great moderation and good taste, declined to raise incidentally the question of his rights as a churchman, and greatly exalted himself, by his unexpected courtesy, in the eyes even of his adversaries.

THE SHAKERS.

You will be surprised to hear that we have got a full-blown colony of Shakers troubling the well-conducted British mind. Our famous old Mother Southcott was succeeded by a vigorous rival—one Mother Girling, an Ipswich prophetess who attracts sentimental young people to her. Some say they dance with great freedom from attire, sing, and won't pay rent. They have been residing on a mortgaged property in Hampshire, and the mortgagee could neither get his money nor his interest. He then evicted the whole colony, brutally or thoughtlessly, in the cold weather, and one hundred and twenty persons, half-clad and ill-fed, passed their days and nights in the snow; whereupon humane England was scandalized. The Hon. Auberon Herbert offered one of his barns to shelter them, and wrote to the Times to say he does not see that these Girling Shakers are more superstitious in expecting that God will pay their rent than the Archbishop of Canterbury was in praying for rain, when Mr. Herbert was member for Nottingham. He horrified conventional politicians by declaring himself in favor of a republican form of government, and now he has horrified more people by comparing the Archbishop to Mother Girling. The Hon. Mr. Cowper-Temple, the heir of Lord Palmerston, who had always a generous side to his nature, is getting up subscriptions for these impracticable Shakers. With our Poor Law we cannot allow poor people to die of want, and these people would die if somebody did not take care of them. They are sharp enough to see they are masters of the situation. Guardians of the poor are distracted to know what to do with them; the hard-working shop-people do not like to be taxed for the support of the impracticable saints. If Mother Girling succeeds in getting her followers supported by the British public, she will soon have a large number of disciples. We have a Tory government strongly in favor of endowments; Mr. Disraeli has a strong idea that he is an ecclesiastical minister of genius; and we are expecting he may bring in a bill to endow the Girlingites.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

THE TRAGEDY OF LABOR.

When we consider how much pain and hardship, deprivation and want the toilers and laborers of the world have always endured, we can scarcely wonder that some of the early writers should have represented labor as a doom imposed upon man in consequence of a terrible disobedience of divine command.

The laborer, indeed, always has been in certain respects a doomed man. In the first place he was a slave; in which capacity he performed labor, not because it was delightful to him, but because he was compelled to do it,—and, moreover, labored not for himself but for others. As a slave, the laborer was not permitted to enjoy the fruits of his own labor, but those fruits—the abundance of them—were appropriated by another, the laborer only being allowed about so much as was necessary to support life. Of course, in this capacity of a slave, where he could not enjoy what he produced, where what wealth he created he could not call his own, where even all his time and strength to labor were claimed by another,—of course, in this condition of enforced servitude the laborer did not find labor anything but a curse, inasmuch as it afforded him neither happiness nor welfare. He looked upon it as an evil, to be avoided if possible; for it brought him wretchedness, disappointment, sorrow, and shame. His master looked upon labor as a degradation, something wholly unfit for himself, and belonging entirely to a servile class. Thus labor really had no honor in the eyes of any lass; it conferred no dignity upon any body, but rather humiliation. Its sign was not a crown but a collar; not a laurel upon the brow, but a chain upon the limb. To create or produce wealth was not honorable; but to possess it, to enjoy it, to spend it—that was honorable!

This was the estimate put upon labor, and this the condition of the laborer, in all countries and in all times where and when slavery existed. This made the part of the laborer in the great world's drama a most tragical one. His part it was to do and dare and suffer most; his part to give but not to take, to supply but not to have, to uphold others but be himself crushed down, to build but not to inhabit. His part it was to be the ladder on which others mounted; his to stand in the background and wait, while others went forward and took the prizes; his to lag behind in the world's civilization, and see others advance to leisure, refinement, culture, art, knowledge, and power. No wonder is it that the enslaved, degraded, and poor laboring class have filled the world with their distressful and clamorous cries; that they have saturated the page of history with their tears, and made its narrative pathetic with their sorrow. No wonder is it that they have besieged Heaven with their prayers for a happy deliverance from this life and a condition all of rest from labor in the life to come; nor that in their woe they have sometimes become desperate, and upheaved society from its foundations in a blind, brute strength of desire for relief. Enslaved labor has been always a mine not only of distress but of danger, because by injustice and tyranny it has fired the slow heart of the oppressed and wronged to blaze forth at last with wrath and revenge and desolation. Simply for this reason, if for no other, that oppression is dangerous even to the oppressor, slavery has been obliged to give way to freedom; and gradually throughout the civilized world voluntary labor has been supplanting enslaved labor.

But although in England and America, to-day, the laborer is no longer a slave before the law, his condition is still a tragical one, and full of pathos. Though not any longer a legal bondman, he is yet a poor man, and, what is worse, a wronged one. The laborer, though truly "worthy of his hire," has not yet fully and fairly received it; it is still withheld from him by the system of society which includes him.

The world is full of wealth. Who created or produced that wealth? The laborer. Does he then possess it? No; but for the most part they possess it who did not earn it.

No one, I think, can doubt that this is the fact, who looks abroad upon society with keen observing eyes. The laborer toils and toils, but as a rule he does not grow rich. Others who toil far less, and many indeed who toil not at all,—these still, as under the old system of slavery, somehow accumulate in their hands the wealth, and continue to hold it from passing in equitable proportion to the hands of the principal producer. The laborer, then, finds that voluntary labor scarcely brings him more rewards than slave labor did. As a slave he received the necessities of life; as a freeman he receives little more, and not infrequently even less. Moreover, he still finds that the laborer, especially the poor laborer, hardly receives more honor from society than formerly. He sees that in proportion as a man becomes independent of labor, or of that labor which is hardest and most disagreeable, he meets with distinguished social recognition and favor. The distinction between "genteel" and "menial" labor he observes is still made, both as to rank and reward in wages; and the rush from the more productive avocations to the less productive goes on, as though respectability increased in direct ratio with unserviceableness. The laborer of to-day sees all this,—his poverty and want, his lack of refinements and education, his social disfavor and humiliation, his disadvantage with those who are rich and those who have more cunning and less honesty than he,—he sees all this, and he inwardly feels that he is wronged by somebody or something, and he cannot withhold the smothered cry of indignation and protest.

And this is the condition and this the attitude of the laborer in this country to-day. His condition is one of deep-seated discontent, and his attitude one of growing indignation and protest. It is a bad omen for any country when its laborers are not at peace with it; when they feel themselves wronged and oppressed by its laws and its social institutions. When wealth accumulates in the hands of a few, when giant corporations tyrannize over masses of dependent toilers, when huge monopolies are made by selfish men of the necessities of life, which hungry mouths are needing and which hands willing to labor are withheld from procuring, when money-kings control legislatures and dictate legislation solely in their own interests,—when this is to any considerable extent the state of things in any nation, danger is not far from its door. The tragedy of labor prolonged indefinitely is sure to produce tragic results not only to the laborer but to society at large. Actual starvation in some parts of the West, and stagnation of industry and enforced idleness throughout the East, are inexcusable in a land so full of natural and created wealth and intelligent and able-bodied laborers as America is to-day. These facts, taken in connection with the condition of affairs in the Southern States of this Union, involving not only disorganization of politics but of industry and civil society, altogether present a problem to our country, the serious nature of which was never before surpassed.

In my opinion, the Labor Question, and all that it involves, is one of the most important matters before the American people to-day. That settled upon the right basis, and we have proceeded far towards true civilization. That unsettled, or settled upon a false basis, and we have social anarchy, which from being latent must soon become patent. The discussion of this whole question is preëminently in order; and I am glad to know that it is being discussed in many circles, by thoughtful and earnest men and women. Let all views and theories and methods be presented, which any intelligent and serious man or woman has to offer. No one of them is likely exactly or entirely to cover the ground, but out of many counsels wisdom will come at last. Let us proclaim ideas and principles, the best and truest that we know; and let us have faith in the power of these to change not only the conduct of individuals but the character of a whole people. Let us proclaim EQUITY as widely as our fathers proclaimed liberty and equality; EQUITY, without which liberty is worthless and equality impossible. This simple idea,—an idea not belonging to any school or party, but one which commends itself to all just persons,—when lodged in the minds and hearts of men and women, will renovate society from its foundations, and bring capital and labor, the employer and the employed, into mutually respecting and harmonious relations.

Communications.

GOD AND RELIGION.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

These two words forming the subjects of my communication are forever in the mouth of everybody, the educated and uneducated, the scientist and the ignorant, the believing and the sceptic; and yet no one knows in fact what they really signify. Each gives them a different definition and uses them in a different sense, according either to instructions he has received regarding them or to his own individual thoughts and reflections. Your own lecture as reported in THE INDEX of January 7 brought these facts forcibly to my mind. Let us, then, examine them a little closer.

I. God.—The first question that presents itself to us on this subject is, Is there a God? and, if we affirm it, Who or what is he? These questions divide at once the above heterogeneous classes. The uneducated, ignorant, and believing accept the theological answer, affirm the existence of a personal, anthropomorphic God, believe in him as he was taught to them in Sunday-schools and other ecclesiastical institutions; and these classes will allow neither doubt, reasoning, nor questioning on that subject. With them we have done, then; for, although we may reject their belief as false and erroneous, they cannot be affected thereby (more than getting angry and horrified). Their God is fixed. The educated, the scientists, the sceptics, on the other hand, leave these "open questions," which each of them answers according to his own reasonings and reflections, being forced to reject the theological, personal, anthropomorphic God of the former. But while some of them deny the existence of a God altogether (atheists), others believe in a God whom they define or imagine in the most varied manner,—some identifying him with the universe (pantheists), others denying his personal existence, yet ascribing to him an individual existence distinct from the universe (theists). In regard to the nature of this distinct existence and the essence of this God, however, there are almost as many views and explanations as there are such believers. For there never was any one who knew anything on that subject, and all that some pretend to know is, in reality, mere force of habit or teaching, speculation, and fancy. Even the first class of believers (theologians and their followers), in spite of their pretensions, positiveness, and arrogance, know no more on this subject than anybody else.

The belief in the theological God is, of course, as I already stated, not worth our attention; the atheists acknowledge no God, and thus offer us nothing to be considered; and the pantheists know only the Universe—no God out of it. Thus it is really but the God of the theists—to my mind the most inconsistent God—that we may consider. But now, is it not rather curious for rational scientific men to make so much of, and talk so inconsistently about, a being which H. Spencer and those who follow him call "the Unknowable," of which those who oppose him—yourself among them—not only admit that they, too, know nothing, but cannot know anything? All we know and can know is Facts—Nature; and even of her we know but comparatively little. Our part it is, however, to study her, and to conform our lives to her laws. "Harmony with Nature," you say yourself in the above quoted lecture, "is most complete when most conscious, free, and glad; and it follows that he will be in the highest sense religious who enters willingly, cheerfully, and gladly into relations of entire harmony between himself and the universal All." (Would it not be better, clearer, and more consistent to say plainly Nature?) "Names are of small moment, when ideas of such sublimity engage our thoughts; yet I freely confess to you that no name for this universal All, with which every rational and sincere mind desires most profoundly to be at peace, is so sweet, so satisfying, so true, as the name of God."

Now, my dear friend, are names really of so "small moment"? I think the name is, at least in this case, of very great moment. That name, God, has in the English as in every language a most definite use and signification; one, too, greatly at variance with your indefinite and, if not pantheistic, imaginary "universal All." Can, then, a name thus made use of be of "small moment"? Say, rather, that we know not, cannot know, anything of God, yet that some insist to imagine him in one fashion or another, and you express the truth. No name will express it.

II. Religion.—As in respect to God, so must I, in respect to religion, first of all ask, What is religion? But no more satisfactory answer can be given to this than to the former question. It is but a word, a name again, explained, interpreted, used, and understood according to the individuality of the one who uses it, like the word God; and this accounts for the many and various explanations given of it. To explain it etymologically, as is generally done, may do well enough for theologians and their dupes; but it is now becoming obsolete, and rejected by the best thinkers. Webster defines it, "The recognition of God as an object of worship. . . . any system of faith and worship." But of all definitions I have ever seen—and they are numerous and varying enough,—I like your own best; and this, to my mind, needs no apology, as you seem to think it does, "because religion thus defined does not include an avowal of faith in God and immortality." On the contrary, I consider it best because it does not include this avowal of faith in ideas the reality of whose objects cannot be proven, while it includes all the realities that alone make life worth living for. "Abstract recogtions,' or 'attractions,' or 'relations.' I do not consider inferior to it "because they take religion out of the world of real life," but because they are but abstractions, while life is a reality, and can only deal with realities. But religion itself is no reality, however we may define it. Strauss, in The Old and the New Faith, is right, as that acute reasoner generally is, when he says: "In so far Feuerbach is correct, when he says the origin and the real essence of religion is the wish. Had man no wishes, he had also no gods. What man wishes to be, but is not, that he makes his god; what he would like to have, but knows not to procure for himself, that his God shall procure him."

Your own definition is again the best because it means reality—humanity, not religion. "The trouble is," you also say correctly, though not exactly in your sense, "that religion means so much that no concise phrase can utter it all." In the sense, however, you put this sentence, it is only true when you take the word religion in its common sense (e.g., as above in Webster's); but taken in the sense of being "an effort of man to perfect himself in all his relations," it is true and simple, not meaning much, only requiring much of man. Yet all it requires are human efforts, blessed and blessing realities, no abstract or imaginary relations and duties. But, thus understood, you will on close scrutinizing find that your definition is not a definition of religion, but of humanity; that you put again only a name for another thing, a name, having a sense, meaning, and use quite different from the thing or word you put it for. Nevertheless, thus defined, I will accept your definition and—your "religion."

But if you mean by your definition and by "religion" really the thing—ideas that this name or word conveys,—I cannot agree with you. For thus used it includes, and must include whether you mean it or not, "an avowal of faith in God and immortality;" in other words, it is but the name, but not the thing, religion. More: it must include also the "relations of man to God." But how can your or any other person's definition "include an avowal of faith in God and immortality," or of "man's relations to God," as long as God and immortality remain but problems? Truly you may say again, "The trouble is that religion means so much."

Now, my dear friend, having the fact before us that God and immortality are, at best, but problems; that religion is but an abstraction, as are consequently the relations of man to God; that the only reality, the only thing that really concerns us, is humanity, would it not be time and best, more becoming at least rational, scientific men, to leave these problems to the "spirits out of the body" (if there should be such things) to solve, and give their attention and "efforts" to facts and realities, and names to things they signify and belong to?

Yours for Humanity, MORRIS EINSTEIN.
TITUSVILLE, Pa., Jan. 15, 1875.

[The only answer we can give to the above at present is to refer Mr. Einstein to the Index Tracts, "The God of Science" and "A Study of Religion: the Name and the Thing." We do not see that he has raised any points not already considered at length in those essays.—ED.]

AN APPEAL TO THE PHILANTHROPIC.

WELLINGTON, Kan., Jan. 3, 1875.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

As our "Christian" friends are receiving material aid, to be distributed among the suffering masses of our county, from different societies in the East, and as many poor mothers with large families of small children are still suffering for the common necessities of life, and without other and further help than yet seems to be presented will suffer still, I am constrained to appeal to our liberal friends through THE INDEX, in the hope that they too will lend to us of Sumner County, Kansas, such aid as their abilities and desires may prompt them to give, after considering the following facts and figures: Sumner County has a population of about six thousand inhabitants, the majority of whom are natives of the Eastern States. During the year 1873, the crop of corn (our staple) was a total failure. In consequence of this very little meat was fattened for use during the winter of 1873 and 1874, and the ensuing summer. Potatoes, and all other vegetables, were a total failure. Some winter wheat was raised, but not enough for home consumption until it is grown again. It will be, at least, six long months, before another crop will begin to assist our impoverished people in living without hunger; and not more than one in fifty families has sufficient provisions on hand to last them sixty days, or clothing to protect them from the cold blasts of winter, now upon them, nor money or credit to obtain the same from any source whatever. Stock of all kinds has to be wintered on hay, as there is no grain to give them; and though there are hundreds of acres of good ground under cultivation, and ready or the plough in the spring, very few can successfully cultivate it, for want of seed-grain and grain for teams, while ploughing, planting, and tending their crops. We have been credibly informed that three car-loads of provisions were donated in the State of Illinois for the sufferers of this county, and placed in charge of a good parson of the Methodist Church, to be shipped free to Wichita, Kansas; but this "man of God" sent these liberal donations to another county in this State, "where several Methodist societies were unable to be left without their respective ministers, if not relieved." The quotation is the excuse of this ecclesiastical scamp for his "pious fraud," by which these generous donors, and the sufferers to be relieved hereby, were cheated. The donation that would do our fellow-citizens the most good, after the first of February next, would, in my opinion, be the means to purchase seed-oats for spring sowing. We cannot rely on corn grown in Northern latitudes for planting here. Spring wheat is an unsafe crop, while oats can be raised with less work for our poor teams, and are quite sure of good returns. Parties wishing to assist us in Sumner County may do so, without the fear of imposition, by conferring with Gov. T. A. Osborn, Topeka, Kansas, who will furnish directions for the application of all donations, through the Kansas Aid Society, with office at Topeka, agreeably to the directions of the donors.

Respectfully,
L. F. BLODGETT.

[Owing to the great number of manuscripts in our hands waiting for publication, the above appeal remained unread among them till this week—it being impossible to read them all immediately on receipt; and we greatly regret the delay thus caused. We can now only express our hope that the many wealthy readers of THE INDEX will be moved to respond promptly and generously to this call for their assistance, which we doubt not is sorely needed.—ED.]

A PROTEST, WITH AN ADDITION.

Most cordially do I unite with THE INDEX in its protest against the refusal of a court to admit the testimony of a witness merely because of his religious views. There must be a deep-seated superstition in our laws, if this is allowable. Surely there is something for liberals to do in behalf of perfect freedom.

How can one be declared to have no religious views who believes in the Infinite, Eternal, and Self-Existent? If one adds "Universe," instead of God, does that alter the fundamental conception? Call the Infinite God, or Universe, or Nature, or Law, or Matter, or Spirit, the same idea is at the bottom, the same adorable reality. All these terms are but vague human expressions of that wondrous mystery before which we all bow. I use the word God because it conveys more of its light and beauty to the mind. It is the fullest and grandest expression I can get. But if another uses the word "Universe," is his belief, his reverence, necessarily less than mine? That one should be thrust out of court as a witness because he uses a certain word to express the Illimitable is indeed a disgrace, not only to our law that makes it possible, but to a judge who so interprets it; for he must have a very shallow notion of religion.

But I wish to protest against the action of Woodhull, Claflin & Co. as the hugest disgrace of all. This notorious firm profess to be liberals of the liberals; and yet for the sake of a few dollars and cents they resort to the most shameful trickery. They raise a hue and cry for freedom, and yet violate its most sacred principles. What is the use of liberalism, if this is the end? Better stick to the old superstitions and be honest, than sweep the country with "new ideas," and have "chaos come again" where rascality wins the day. The popular impression is that Orthodoxy, even if false, conduces to morality: So long as that impression remains, so long will Orthodoxy remain, and liberalism will be left out in the cold; as it ought to be, if it cannot make men more honest than Orthodoxy. This is a radical trouble with liberalism. It is too much a mere hurrah for freedom. It is not a struggle for more honor, nobility, and manhood. Too many liberals cheat and lie, and do all sorts of mean things. Give us the grim morality of the Puritans, if we can have nothing better. Our modern sweetness and light are a shame, if they do not make us pay our debts fairly and squarely. John Calvin burning Servetus, with an intense conviction to back him up, is infinitely preferable to our "new lights" putting an "atheist" out of court as a witness for the sake of a mere legal advantage. The "Religious Freedom Amendment" is not the main thing, though of vast importance, nor perfect freedom, nor new truths, however glorious; but that liberals be honest, true, and regardful of the rights of others. If we have new truths, put them into new virtues, new nobilities, new honesties, new purities, and new excellences.

I would not condemn Woodhull & Claflin in the least for opinions honestly held and expressed; but if what Mr. Treat says is true, then I for one proclaim their liberalism a sham, and the less we have of that sort the better.

"TOO MUCH OF SPIRITUALISM."

SAVANNAH, Ga., Jan. 19, 1875.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Though a Spiritualist, I am also a constant reader of THE INDEX, and a special admirer of the fair and impartial manner in which the editor treats and allows to be treated all questions in its columns; but I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise that any one professing to be liberal could possibly give expression to sentiments so narrow and prejudiced as those breathed forth in the communication headed, "Too Much of Spiritualism."

The writer, with an egotism and self-complacency that present the double aspect of being ludicrous as well as lamentable, pronounces his imperial dictum against all the phenomena of Spiritualism, because, forsooth, it seems to his mind a foolish superstition; and because of occasional exposures of fraud and deception, he would, with one sweep of his mighty hand, dismiss the whole subject as unworthy of discussion in the columns of THE INDEX.

Now it is a matter of no concern whatever to intelligent Spiritualists, nor to the cause they represent, whether your correspondent believe or disbelieve in the constantly-occurring facts and phenomena of Spiritualism. The world is acquainted with a man wiser and more learned than himself (Faraday) who said of tables rising, "It cannot be, it is impossible." But the facts stand, nevertheless; tables do rise without even so much as the touch of a human hand upon them. Thousands of reliable witnesses affirm the truth of these things, and it would avail nothing, as proof, though ten times as many of the dogmatic negations of ignorance and prejudice were arrayed against these facts. Nay, more; not only do these facts exist, but science utterly fails to explain or account for them upon any known scientific law. This is now being generally conceded; but as to whether the origin of the phenomena is a spiritual one, as claimed by Spiritualists, is yet an open question in the minds of many earnest investigators. But we repeat, as to the facts themselves, they exist beyond the possibility of doubt; and your correspondent displays not only ignorance, but a spirit of prejudice unbecoming a professedly liberal mind, in his wholesale denial of, and contempt for, phenomena that baffle the skill of science itself in discovering the laws which govern them. If, as this writer flippantly asserts, these rappings and table-tippings are foolish, we can consistently conclude that there is a great deal of foolishness in Nature; for in her fields phenomena constantly occur, the cause or use of which science fails to divine or to comprehend. But who dares to deny their existence, or that they serve some use in the laboratories of the universe, because human wisdom thus far fails to fathom them? Surely no reverent soul will presume to pronounce that a fraud, or a superstition, which involves a question of so grave importance as these phenomena involve; that is, the question of immortality. Feeling only a desire to vindicate the truth as it appears to me, I am, fraternally,

A "GLIMPSE."

One beautiful morning in June, I stood beneath a tall maple, admiring its beauty, and listening to the prattle of a seven-year-old boy whose questions in regard to God and Nature often put me to a stand-still for reply. Presently a large robin-redbreast flew to the top of the tree, and, swelling his little throat, sung forth in merry glee. This caught the attention of my little boy. He turned to his mother, who was coming into the garden, and said: "Mother, who made that robin? What makes him sing so?" "God made the robin," said the mother, "and the robin is praising him for this delightful morning."

We went to an arbor and sat down. The boy looked thoughtful beyond his years. In about half an hour the kitchen-maid came running into the garden, saying: "The robin had flown to the ground and was picking at the strawberry bed, when old Tom, the cat, was behind the rose-bushes, and sprang upon the bird, and was eating him." We all went to the spot where Tom, the cat, had the pretty bird weltering in its blood.

"Mother," said our blue-eyed boy, who was the first to speak, "Mother, who made Tom, our old cat?" "God made him, my child," replied the mother. "Well," said the child, "who made him catch our dear, darling birdie that was singing to God?" "Tis his nature to catch birds," said the mother; "God made him so."

The child's brow contracted; a peculiar movement of the curved lips showed the feelings within. His hands were raised to his little head, as he caught my eyes, and, looking me full in the face, he said: "I can't! I can't!" then, rushing up to me, whispered in my ear: "I can't love God." He was not old enough to say: "I cannot see any consistency in such things; I cannot reconcile them to my mind;" but the natural instincts of his nature, the law of love and goodness within him, a little one, was insulted by such answers from even his mother. How easy to teach such a child to cultivate the God within—the light that lighteth every mind!

A PLAN FOR SECURING EDUCATED SUFFRAGE.

DEAR INDEX:—

The importance of the subject makes me ask a chance to say a word more about "Female Suffrage" and "Ignorant Voters." I think the whole problem would be solved, if all men and women who have the requisite age and length of residence, and are naturalized or native-born citizens, but are not already voters, could become so by appearing at the place of registry at least three months before the election, filling up in a printed form of application the blanks for name, place of residence, length of residence in that State and district, and date of birth, as well as of naturalization if not American-born; and then, after themselves writing out all this, reading aloud the completed form of application to be registered as voters.

This would enfranchise all women fit to vote, would disfranchise no one now voting except illiterates who change their residence, and would subject all men and women, not already voters, to precisely the same educational test.

It seems to me that female suffrage could be established as easily in this way as in any other, and much more advantageously, not only to the State, but to the sex.

F. M. HOLLAND.

A SCOTCHMAN went to a lawyer once for advice, and detailed the circumstances of the case. "Have you told me the facts precisely as they occurred?" asked the lawyer. "Oh, ay, sir," replied he; "I tell ye the plain truth. Ye can put the lies into it yourself!"

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "

 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a Successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,
 has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
 PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.HORTICULTURAL HALL*LECTURES*FOR 1875.

The Committee of the Free Religious Association, in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons, again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged:—

REASONS FOR USING THEEUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———.

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSSES.

ALL of our readers, whether Spiritualists or not, will be interested to read Hon. Robert Dale Owen's letter among our "Communications" this week.

REV. E. E. HALE took Mr. Phillips' place last Sunday in the Horticultural Hall lecture course. His subject was "The American Theory of Government."

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON protests against "caste schools" at the South. So must every citizen who wishes to "get the negro out of politics" in the only practicable way—by respecting all his rights.

THE PRESBYTERY of Louisville voted that Rev. Dr. Wilson should apologize to Rev. Dr. Robinson for outrageous personality; whereupon the culprit defiantly announced his intention of "waiting till the Day of Judgment"!

THE TOTAL military force at the command of Germany is 1,684,200 men; of Russia, 1,376,860; of France, 1,098,400; of Austria, 865,900; of Italy, 741,700; of England, 280,240. How far off appears the day of universal peace!

REV. J. S. DICKERSON (Baptist) preached his farewell sermon at South Boston last Sunday. At the close of the services "nine young ladies and a young blind man" joined the church, as the daily papers say with unconscious satire.

"A. G." has a capital article against tax-exemption in the Hampshire Gazette of February 2. Let every reader of THE INDEX who believes in the righteousness of repealing the laws which exempt church-property from taxation get a short article on the subject into his local paper. Such voices will be heard by thousands where THE INDEX never penetrates.

IN JUSTICE to Mr. Hallowell, we ought to have stated last week that he did not represent the "majority of the Northern people" as "White Leaguers." His article was on the "Boston White League" only, and was not intended to be of universal application; and as it was so fresh in the minds of our readers, it did not occur to us, as it should have done, to make any rectification on this point.

THE CHINESE have just celebrated their New Year festival in New York city, at their joss-house or temple in the Sixth Ward. "Wooden idols and heathen ceremonies" are said to have been prominent features of the occasion, which ended with a "grand opium smoke." Such things may be grossly superstitious, and worse; but the Buddhists have as good a right as the Christians to celebrate public worship in their own way.

THE TOWN of Concord, Massachusetts, proposes to celebrate the Centennial Anniversary of the "Concord Fight" on the nineteenth of April. George William Curtis, Esq., will deliver the oration; the President of the United States, and many other distinguished personages, are expected to be present. A bronze statue of a Minute-Man is to be set up on the spot where was "fired the shot heard round the world"; and various festivities will signalize the occasion.

THE Congregationalist says: "THE INDEX wants to know if the people are to accept the Bible, the corner-stone of Protestantism, as being also the corner-stone of the Republic? We so understand it." We doubt whether the Congregationalist understands itself, at any rate. Does it mean to say that the Bible is the foundation of the organic law of the land? That is what our question meant. If that is what the Congregationalist means to answer affirmatively, the Christian Amendment movement has gained a convert, and common sense has lost one.

THE NEW YORK Graphic of February 2 has an excellent editorial on "Atheists in Court," which states that "Mr. James Parton, the historian, Mr. Charles Moran, ex-President of the Erie Railway, Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, and other well-known gentlemen have subscribed a sum of money sufficient to test the legality and constitutionality of Judge McAdams' decision" in the case of Mr. Joseph Treat. We are pleased to notice that two of the above-named gentlemen, at least, are subscribers to THE INDEX; and we hope that their generous effort for equal rights will be crowned with success.

IN an inland town of California, it is reported that a certain man has become "converted," and recently made this touching speech at a church-meeting: "I have made up my mind to give my property to the service of the Lord. I have several thousand dollars in money, all of which I bestow on the church. I have some fine blooded stock, especially some Black Hawk horses, all of which I give to the church. I have also a lot of grain and farm produce, which in like manner I bestow on the church. There is but one thing in all my possessions which I reserve for myself, and that is my celebrated medicine for the cure of diphtheria, which I will continue to sell, as heretofore, for the moderate price of $2 a bottle."

THE CIVIL RIGHTS bill which has passed the United States House of Representatives is good as far as it goes; but it ought to have been made to protect the right of colored children to attend the public schools. It is impossible to furnish separate schools of equal excellence for whites and blacks; the only way to secure the full benefits of school privileges to the negroes is to insist on their right to attend the same schools provided for the whites. Hence we regret the timidity which has prevented the Republican majority in the House from passing a thorough-going bill before the golden hour is lost. But the bill as it is is better than one sanctioning separate schools explicitly, and simply postpones the question to the future.

"I WILL freely confess," said Bishop Wilmer to the Louisiana investigating committee, "that I am not in favor of universal suffrage." That tells the whole story. There is a widespread conspiracy at the South to crush out negro suffrage, and it will succeed if the North does not do its duty. It becomes daily plainer that the rascality of Republican officials at the South is endangering the whole fruits of the war—that greed of office and plunder on their part threatens to create a disgust for Republicanism so deep and strong as to throw all political power into the hands of those who are determined, if possible, to annul the fifteenth Amendment. Whoever defends the Kelloggs and Returning Boards of the South to-day is directly contributing to this result. We must insist on equal rights and honest administration both, or there are terrible perils ahead.

THIS SENTENCE in the Nation of February 4 surprises us by its admission that Charles Sumner's doctrine of the territorial condition of the South at the close of the war was a tenable one, contrary to what was, we believe, the Nation's opinion at the time. It now admits that the government "could, in short, by either taking charge of the machinery of government at the South itself, or using its influence to throw it into the hands of the more intelligent portion of the community, and prevent its prostitution to the base uses of knaves and adventurers, have so lightened the evil results of the war that the two races might have drifted into amicable relations, and the negroes have learned their lesson in politics without associating power with plunder and corruption." The italics are ours. Would that Sumner's wise foresight had been possessed by the people ten years ago, and that the Nation had been as wise then as it is now on that point!

God in the Constitution, and the Bible in the Schools.

EXTRACT FROM A LECTURE DELIVERED IN THE CITY OF NEWCASTLE, PA., JAN. 4, 1875.

BY A. B. BRADFORD.

The next attainment which our century has made, not only for America but for the world, is a clear and correct view of the relations between Government and the Church.

The contrast between the European and American ideas on this subject is striking. The darkness of night is not more opposite to the brightness of the mid-day sun than these two theories of government are to each other. The doctrine in which Europe has been educated for many centuries is that, in the economy of grace, the State is merely subsidiary to the Church, and that this relation is settled by the voice of inspiration in Isaiah, xlix., 23, and its parallel passages, where it is declared for all time that "Kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers; they shall bow down to thee with their faces towards the earth, and lick up the dust of thy feet. Kings shall minister unto thee. And the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish." Upon these texts is built the doctrine imported into this country, and advocated with much zeal and ability by the Religious Amendment party, that the State is a person—a "moral person," and I might add, a good-natured, stupid person; that it has breasts full of milk; that it is androgynous in its gender,—that is to say, it is a hermaphrodite, combining the male and female sexes in one person; that its chief function is to suckle the Church, the father giving milk as well as the mother.

In illustration of this, take any of the governments of the Old World, England, for instance. On one knee, and tugging at one breast, this venerable dame called Great Britain, in her capacity of "nursing mother," has the Church of England on her lap. On the other knee she has the Church of Scotland, which, from the way she "lays to," is as fond of milk as her Episcopal sister. As there is not room enough on her lap for more than two, the Irish Presbyterians have a bone to pick with a little meat on it, thrown to them in the shape of regium donum.

The majority of the English people are Dissenters. That is, they are neither Episcopalians nor Presbyterians; but Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, and Catholics, who dissent from the religion established by law, and build their own meeting-houses, and support their own ministers; and in addition to all this, pay their share towards the expense of keeping the "nursing mother" in milk for the exclusive benefit of the Episcopal and Presbyterian churches; and this milk costs many millions of dollars every year. If any one rises up and cries shame at the Established Church for compelling dissenters and outsiders to give their money to support a church they don't believe in, the bishops and clergy reply in this style: "We are the Church of God; and is it not foretold and ordained of the Church, in the sixtieth chapter of Isaiah and sixteenth verse, not only that she 'shall suck the breast of kings,' but especially that 'she shall suck the milk of the Gentiles'—the outsiders? Did not the prescient eye of the Evangelical prophet rest upon the Church of England, when he assures her, in the closing chapter of his prophecy, 'that she may suck and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations;' 'that she may milk out, and be delighted with the abundance of her glory;' 'that the glory of the Gentiles shall be extended to her like a flowing stream' (of milk); and 'that she shall suck, yea, that she shall be borne upon her sides, and be dandled on her knees?'"

The effect, all over Europe, and in all past ages, of thus converting the Civil Magistrate, under the name of a nursing father and nursing mother, into a milk-giving animal, which, like a farrow cow, is always fresh, has been to make the Church alternately proud and cringing, haughty and mean, domineering and sycophantic.

Among the Protestant sects of the United States there is but one, the Reformed Presbyterian church, whose creed is the unexpurgated Westminster Confession of Faith, which makes the same claim upon civil government for money support on the one side, and ecclesiastical control on the other, that the Catholic Church does. In chapter twenty-nine of her "Testimony," which is superadded to the Confession, and equally binding upon her members, she declares that "it is the duty of the Christian magistrate to take order that open blasphemy and idolatry, licentiousness and immorality be suppressed, and that the Church of Christ be supported throughout the Commonwealth; and for the better discharge of these important duties, it is lawful for him to call synods, in order to consult with them; to be present at them, not interfering with their proceedings, but supporting the independency of the Church, and its righteous decisions, and preserving its unity and order against the attempts of such despisers of ecclesiastical authority as should endeavor in a riotous manner to disturb their proceedings." If any one is curious to ask what is meant by the phrase "Church of Christ," in whose behalf so astounding a claim is made, the answer is found in the formula of queries to be put to ministers and ruling elders at their ordination, where it is declared in the third section that "the Lord Jesus Christ, the only Redeemer and Head of his Church, has appointed one permanent form of ecclesiastical government; and that this form is, by divine right, Presbyterian."

Now, when our fathers of the American Revolution cleared away the rubbish of centuries, and laid the foundations of the Republic, after securing the union of the States, their next care was to divorce the State from the Church by an eternal and irrevocable decree. They declared that the government of the United States was neither masculine nor feminine in its gender, but neuter, and therefore, in the very nature of the case, could not nurse. Our body politic is not a person, but a thing; it has no milk organs developed; from the neck down it is as straight and as flat as a plank. Having no teats to suck, as Mr. John Bull has, of course it has no lap to dandle children on, and no lullaby to sing them to sleep when they are full.

In thus secularizing the government the founders of the Republic were actuated by two motives. In the first place, they wished to avoid in this country the bloody wars and persecutions which had been desolating Europe for a thousand years, all growing out of a union of Church and State; and which would inevitably be repeated here if they adopted the European idea that the State was a nursing mother with fine lacteal glands that never went dry; and that the church which had the most strength to fight for it could get the most milk.

In the second place, they had too much respect for religion to treat the Church as an infant to remain in the swaddling bands of babyhood forever, sucking its unnatural and poisonous nourishment from the breasts of the State. And does not time prove their judgment to be correct? Where on earth is religion more respected by the masses than it is in this country? In what nation of Europe has the Church, notwithstanding her divisions, reached such a stalwart growth? The reason is that here the Church is free. The government treats her as a full-grown person, able to take care of herself, and not as a sucking babe, incapable of standing on its own legs, and puling and puking in its nurse's arms. The Pope himself, if he were to leave his old headquarters at Rome, and establish his ecclesiastical power in New York, would be more free to originate and carry out his church plans than he is in Italy, or would be in any other State of Europe where the Catholic religion is established and supported by law.

The American idea is that government is a secular, soulless corporation, constituted for specific ends, like any other corporate body, and has nothing at all to do with religion or the Church, except to prevent any person from interfering with another in the expressions of his opinions, or in his worship. The name of God does not occur in the Constitution any more than it should in a railroad or bank charter; and President Grant's successor, if he were a Mohammedan, or a Buddhist, or a Parsee, or a Deist, or even an Atheist, could take the oath of office and administer the government. All this was done by our fathers, not because they were not religious—for no men ever had more faith in God, in Man, in truth, and liberty than they had,—but because the sole object of civil government was, not to meddle with religion, or dictate religious dogmas or ceremonies, but to protect from aggression the persons and property of all its people. I know no other way of accounting for the fact that the Catholic church, which is losing ground everywhere in Europe, where it dovetails with monarchy, and is supported by law, is making such rapid advances in this country where it is in deadly antagonism to all our free institutions, and has to support itself. Our Catholic fellow-citizens have found out that, unlike the governments of Europe, the government of the United States, as an incorporated body politic, has no organs which secrete milk, and no teats for the Church to suck; and, depending on their own resources, they are conscious of strength and independence, and are progressing in numbers and influence faster than any Protestant sect.

There are two objections brought to the American governmental theory I have laid down which are worthy of notice. The first, which is no doubt suggested at this moment by an hundred minds in this audience, is that government—State and national—exempts the Church from paying taxes on her property to the amount of more than three hundred and fifty millions of dollars yearly; and that this tax, which the owners of the property ought to pay themselves, has to be paid pro rata by the citizens as such. Yet, when a mob destroys a church building, which pays no taxes for protection, as other property does, the government is to make good the loss out of the public treasury. The explanation of this inconsistency is as follows: In the early settlement of this country the people were sparse and poor; and the States encouraged the various sects that were struggling for existence by exempting their churches, as well as institutions of learning, from taxation, never dreaming that the day would come before the close of the century that the amount of property thus exempted would be over three hundred millions of dollars. From official sources it appears that the value of untaxed

Church property in the United States in the year 1850 was.....	$87,328,801
Value of church property in 1860.....	171,397,932
Value of church property in 1870.....	351,483,581
At the same rate in the year 1900 it would be..	2,835,868,648

Public attention, however, is now directed to this anomaly, and it affords me infinite satisfaction to state that the Rev. Dr. Hovey, a leading minister of the Baptist church, has declared against this tax-exemption as unjust to the rest of the citizens. Also, the Committee of the Illinois Methodist Conference, with a patriotism and a sense of justice which do them honor, have given, in their Report on the subject, ten reasons why church property, in consideration of its protection by the government, should, like every other kind of property, pay its taxes—thus effecting the complete disavowance of the Church and State, and the entire independence of the Church, as the best policy for both parties.

The other objection to the American theory of government as embodied in the Constitution is that millions of dollars are raised every year in the States for the benevolent purpose of popular education. To this I reply, that the money raised by taxation for schools is anything else than benevolence, although it is true that many persons who have no children to educate are largely and cheerfully taxed to educate the children of others. Our common school system is based on the principle that self-preservation is the first law of Nature for a government as well as a person. You might as well try to subvert one of the pyramids of Egypt, and make it stand on its apex, as to perpetuate a Republican government for six generations without diffusing knowledge among the people. In all countries the knowing classes are the rich, the healthy, and the virtuous; while the ignorant classes are the poor, the diseased, and the vicious. Statistics show that three-fourths of the disease, and more than half the crime, are among the poorer classes. Knowledge makes a man virtuous by teaching him that every violation of moral law is inevitably punished. It makes him healthy and happy by teaching him that a natural law is as much a law of God as a moral law, and that health and happiness are the rewards of obedience, while sickness, poverty, loss of character, and wretchedness, are the results of disobedience. Knowledge helps a man to wealth by teaching him the laws of trade, and opening up avenues to enterprise. Ignorance, on the contrary, has no aspiration to better its circumstances, and no power to do so if it had. It victimizes the masses in all countries, and compels them to do the drudgery of the knowing classes.

But in a Republic where every person votes, except women, idiots, and convicts, the masses of the voters must be enlightened, or the government degenerates towards a monarchy, where the king has a standing army to keep the people down, and where the Church, hanging on the breast of its "nursing mother," pays for the milk it sucks by fostering the ignorance, and consequent weakness and superstition, of the masses.

In this connection it is right to say a word on the proposition to introduce the Bible into the schools as a text-book. Remembering that we are an English-speaking race, there is no man of any scholarship who would object to the children of the public schools reading a chapter or two every day from selected portions of the Bible. King James' translation, which is the one in common use, is the best sample of standard English that we have. It is unsurpassed in the beauty and simplicity of its style. Besides, this English language of ours, better spoken in the United States than in the British Isles, is destined to be the universal language of the civilized world. Of course, then, as a literary and educational question, we would all agree to have it as a hand-book in the schools.

But it is a religious question. The Church of Rome repudiates our Bible, both as a translation and as to the subject-matter of it; and forbids her people to read it. As Protestants we make everything of the Bible, placing it before the Church, asserting its plenary inspiration and infallibility, and making it a reading book from infancy to old age. The Church of Rome, on the contrary, claims that she is nearer to Christ, and existed before the New Testament Scriptures were written; and that the rule of faith is in her, and not in them. The Catholics form a large part of the citizenship of the State. They pay their share of the taxes which support the schools. Is it fair, by making our Bible a reading-book, to expose their children to the danger of being Protestantized?

Suppose that in the State of Pennsylvania the Catholics outnumbered the Protestants. Would it be fair in them, because they had the numerical majority, to introduce into the schools their Douai Bible, including the apocryphal books which we reject, and thus run the risk of Romanizing our children? No doubt there is a terrible conflict to be waged with the Church of Rome in this country. She honestly believes in the infallibility of the Pope, and his absolute supremacy over all governments and persons, and that Protestantism is a rebellion against her authority which should be put down. She honestly believes that the education of children should be religious, and that her priesthood should have the control. Our Constitution does not recognize any religion or any church in the world as authority, and our government holds that public education is purely secular. Let us as Protestants adopt no principle, or policy, which, in case we get into a minority, will recoil, like a boomerang, and wound ourselves. Let us plant our feet on the principles laid down by our fathers, and make the divorce between the Church and State complete and eternal. Here alone are we invulnerable. If our Protestant children had no other chance in the world for reading the Bible except in the public schools, the question for some might take another phase. But when we have Sunday-schools and Bible classes innumerable, church reading of the Bible, and all the means of religious instruction at home, it is foolish to say that the Bible as a religious book is needed in the schools. And when we see what a mighty weapon of defence we throw away in the coming conflict by persisting that our Bible shall be read in the schools, it is not only folly but madness to do so. No; it is purely a question of sectarian polemics growing out of the old European quarrels between Catholics and Protestants, and imported into this country by both parties. The Protestant, in placing his version of the Bible in the schools, puts a chip upon his hat, after the fashion of rural bullies, and dares the Catholic, or any other comer, to knock it off. But I hope when our countrymen come to reflect upon the subject, they will allow wisdom and patriotism to triumph over folly and bigotry; and carry out the doctrine of the fathers, and confine the government, the schools, and the churches to their legitimate vocations.

GERRIT SMITH, OF PETERBORO.

BY HON. RUTGER B. MILLER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Whatever difference of opinion may exist in regard to the speculative philosophy, general theories, and practical results which characterize the brilliant personal career of Gerrit Smith, his most determined adversary in the field of controversy concedes to him the possession of the attributes of energetic activity, stimulated by benevolence, and guided by intellect, which combined to render his name eminently worthy of commemoration upon the calendar of the pioneers of progress.

Born in 1797, of Huguenot parentage, on the frontiers of civilization, in the county of Oneida, N. Y., and educated after the strictest order of the sect a Calvinist, he rose superior to his environment, and lived and died a gentleman, a scholar, and a philosopher. In this child of the forest, the love of freedom was organic, innate, invincible, and anarchical in its tendencies. The authority of established institutions, temporal and spiritual, was considered an obstacle rather than a guide in the path of progress, which he determined to demolish by the energy of his Herculean activity. Individualism was his creed—liberty, equality, fraternity, his political motto. Like Calvin, and other great reformers, he disorganized without reorganizing society; like the pioneers who levelled the forest and cleared the land, he left the task of social reconstruction to his successors, to whom he bequeathed his betterments. Like Joseph II., of Austria, he was an iconoclast, destroying the symbols of the social system of the Middle Ages, organized by Hildebrand, as well as the social system of the present day, without rebuilding the social system of the future, thus sacrificing order to progress.

The old Calvinistic church is reformed into a secular school well endowed, and the old academy is reformed into an asylum for children taken from the County Poor House, and placed for service as soon as they become capable of labor. These are the good works by which the Church of Reason is known in Peterboro; and they are the works of Individualism, of the author and finisher of the Church of Reason, which belongs to Gerrit Smith, whose love of freedom prevented him from belonging to any organized church or party. "Sworn to no party, of no sect am I"—was his motto.

But for this unconquerable love of freedom, the Church of Humanity, of Lyric Hall, would perhaps realize Mr. Smith's ideal of a church better than his own Church of Reason: for Mr. Smith was social and æsthetic in his temperament; cold, dry reason was not his natural element. He was emotional, affectionate almost to the feminine degree; hospitable, charitable, full of loving kindness, benevolence, and philanthropy, as is shown by his deeds rather than words. Had Mr. Smith been born some years later, he would probably have embraced the reorganizing Positive Philosophy of the nineteenth century, rather than the disorganizing Negative Philosophy of the eighteenth.

The purely literary and metaphysical character of the early education of Mr. Smith, at a period when the natural sciences were untaught in our academies and colleges, added to his early and wild associations with uncivilized and semi-civilized companions, stimulated an imagination of great power which required the mental discipline and training of a later period, not even yet rigidly applied in our educational system. Poetry, romance, eloquence, rhetoric, oratory, added fuel to the flame of his romantic nature, and rendered purely scientific research unpalatable to a mind naturally independent, and never restrained by financial necessity or social discipline. Hence the extremes and the erratic tendency which characterized his political course, always leaning to virtue's side in his motives and intentions.

His ample fortune, inherited and acquired, enabled him to live in baronial seclusion; above and beyond habitual intercourse and contact with the world upon equal terms, thus aggravating the difficulties arising from early associations, and preventing the development of faculties which, but for this arrest, would have increased his power to do good, and diminished the catastrophes resulting from his premature efforts to reform abuses by remedies worse than the disease. Joseph II., of Austria, is the political prototype of Gerrit Smith, of Peterboro.

"The abilities of Joseph," says his biographer, "might have raised him to a high rank among modern potentates, if his judgment had been more mature and correct. But his spirit was so restless, and his rage so violent for reform, that he did not sufficiently consider the nature, tendency, or probable efficacy of his schemes, or examine how far one was consistent with another; and his disposition was so arbitrary that he would not condescend to adapt his innovations to the temper or wishes of his people, but seemed to think that his will and pleasure constituted an ample recommendation of all the projects or whims with which his brain teemed." At the close of his life, he said: "I would have engraven on my tomb—Here lies a sovereign who, with the best intentions, never carried a single project into execution."

The analogy between Joseph's expulsion of the nuns and the Jesuits, and the anti-dram-shop and anti-slavery movements of Gerrit Smith, is manifest to all candid and competent observers of human events. Frederick the Great, of Prussia, pursued a different policy. While equally opposed to Catholicism, in the abstract, Frederick's philosophy taught him to beware of attempting to disturb existing and long-established institutions, temporal or spiritual, until the ideas upon which these institutions are founded, enlightened by science, have become obsolete; when they will gradually, and spontaneously, and peaceably disappear, without political intervention. Frederick, who was a more profound thinker than Joseph, and a much older man, clearly understood that the social system should be organized in conformity with the spirit of the times, and of the existing state of civilization. Although an absolute monarch and a soldier, and even because he was such, he practised as well as enforced upon others the doctrine of submission to law, of strict discipline, and prompt obedience of orders. Acknowledging no "higher power," no supreme will, he did not substitute his arbitrary will and power as the guiding rule of his conduct in grave political emergencies. No sovereign was ever more intelligent or docile than Frederick as a philosopher, who thoroughly comprehended the meaning of the term law, in the most comprehensive sense of the word as defined by Montesquieu, in his Spirit of Laws, and equally comprehended the wisdom of submission to the inevitable as the only means of modifying the modifiable conditions of existence. In this policy he was imitated by Napoleon III., whose maxim was "On ne détruit que ce qu'on remplace." He only destroyed in order to replace. Catholicism being the basis of the feudal system, the corner-stone of his throne, Frederick did not deem it wise to demolish the foundation of the social system until he had secured a more reliable basis of operations; and the same is true of Napoleon III.

As Catholicism is the basis of the feudal system, slavery was the basis of union of the American colonies in 1776; and the policy of the abolitionists in 1834 was analogous to the expulsion of the Jesuits by Joseph, a policy which he revoked as a blunder worse than a crime. The policy of abolition was persisted in, and our constitutional social system founded upon slavery perished with it, leaving anarchy and a de facto dictatorship as the result of the philanthropic efforts of 1834 to ameliorate the condition of society, without even the semblance of an organic doctrine as a basis of reorganization of either Church or State; both of which were disorganized by the anti-slavery doctrine. How reconstruct the temporal and spiritual institutions of the social system of the future? Does the speculative philosophy of Gerrit Smith furnish any answer to this question? Can any of our political philosophers of theological or metaphysical tendencies furnish the answer? If so, let them furnish it now, or forever hold their peace! Let us have no more disorganization, until we are prepared with a scientific general theory and plan of operations as a basis of reorganization of our disorganized social system, in both its spiritual and temporal branches. If neither "self-evident truths" nor revealed truths furnish a solution of the "Gordian knot of policy," let us try the power of demonstrated truths before cutting the knot with the sword. Theological and metaphysical politics having failed, let us try scientific politics, as the only effectual means of reconciling the contending antagonisms of order and progress. When construction becomes the order of the day, we at once find the profound inanity of all those schools whose function it is to protest forever against Catholicism, the basis of the feudal system, while conceding and adopting its fundamental dogma as the basis of the social system of the future.

Of these schools, Gerrit Smith is an eminent representative, struggling against the practical and logical result of their own anarchical principles, which is military despotism. "So long as progress remains anarchical, order must continue despotic." The President, having called in vain upon Congress for an organic doctrine of reconstruction for the South, resorts to military force to preserve order. Why does not Congress answer? Why not solve the social problem as well as the financial problem before adjournment? Let us have the previous question at once.

"The problem of political and spiritual organization, which is now the order of the day, is a far more difficult one than that of political and spiritual disorganization, requiring a scientific organic doctrine as a basis, derived from and furnished by the Positive Philosophy. The disorganizing and destructive doctrines of the negative philosophy of the eighteenth century are the necessary precursor and pioneer of the nineteenth. This problem is reducible to the rational construction of a political organic doctrine, which in the whole of its practical application shall be always fully consequent upon its own fundamental principles, and free from self-contradiction in its active execution, thus establishing logical harmony instead of incoherence in the troubled system of our ideas." (Comte.)

"Inasmuch as our political and religious and social difficulties spring from intellectual anarchy of opinion, rather than from our institutions, their treatment requires doctrinal rather than methodical remedies, and a modification of opinions, morals, and manners, prior to organic changes in our temporal or spiritual institutions, as a logical security of social order." (Idem.)

"Race and climate being the chief causes of social variations, arbitrary legislation can have no social efficacy, but so far as it is in accordance with the corresponding tendencies of the human mind produced by these causes. The action of one nation upon another, whether by conquest or legislation, can effect merely such modifications as are in accordance with existing social tendencies; the power of the individual over the race is subject to these general limits, even where the effects, for good or for evil, are as easy as possible to produce." (Idem.)

"Political science rightly understood, leading us on in the march of civilization, with as much exactness as the extreme complexity of its phenomena allows, to a systematic prevision of the events which must result from either a given situation or a given aggregate of antecedents, enlightens the practical politician, not only as to the tendencies which should be aided, but as to the means of avoiding the pitfalls into which indiscreet activity is liable to be deluded." (Idem.)

The spiritual and temporal power of the feudal social system being no longer an obstacle to free inquiry and private judgment, in this country at least; liberty, equality, fraternity being secured so far as to leave social forces exempt from despotic interference, temporal or spiritual, reorganization and reconstruction become the order of the day, instead of disorganization and destruction. The old primeval forest having been cleared away, society requires the shelter of systematic order to protect us from the anarchy incidental to the transition between the social system of the past and the social system of the future just dawning upon us. The architectural genius of a Hildebrand is now more needed than the demolishing agencies of the eighteenth century; but more to be desired than either is a scientific organic doctrine as the corner-stone and basis of the industrial régime of the arts and sciences. The feudal social system of Hildebrand, based upon war and theology, has been undermined and shaken to its centre by the constitutional régime, based upon the metaphysical dogma of self-evident truths as an organic doctrine.

The fallacy of this doctrine having been demonstrated, both a priori and a posteriori, during the past century, the crying need of the hour is the generalization of a scientific organic doctrine as the basis of social reconstruction, securing as a practical result order and progress to replace anarchy and despotism.

The close of Gerrit Smith's career, like the eve of a tropical day, was as brilliant as its meridian splendor:

"No pale gradations quench his ray,
No twilight dews his wrath allay;
With disc like bloody target red,
He rushes to his gory bed,
Fills the wide wave with bloody light,
Then sinks at once, and all is night!"

In accordance with his often-expressed desire, he died suddenly; without suffering, in the bosom of his family, and in peace with all. He died on the twenty-sixth of December, 1874, of apoplexy, at the residence of his niece, Mrs. Walters, Clinton Place, New York, surrounded by wife, and children, and grandchildren, nephews, nieces, and friends, by whom he was followed to the grave prepared by himself in Peterboro, Madison County, New York.

To the memory of this great and good man this humble and sincere tribute of respect, containing a dispassionate sketch of his philosophical character, is offered by a life-long political opponent and personal friend.

UTICA, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1875.

MANY years ago Elder Place was called to attend the funeral of an aged female parishioner. At the close of the services the surviving partner stepped forward to the casket to take one last look, and in a tone of regretful resignation gave utterance to the following remark:—

"Well, Betsey, you've been a good wife to me, and I'm sorry to lose you; but I've no doubt you're now sleeping sweetly in Beelzebub's bosom."

"No! no! brother," hastily interposed the astonished minister, "you don't mean that. You mean she is now sleeping in Abraham's bosom."

"Well, elder," rejoined the sorrowing man, "I don't know as it makes much difference whether it is Beelzebub or Abraham. I expect they are both very good men, for we read their names in the Bible."

"PHYSICIAN, HEAL THYSELF."

MY DEAR ABBOT:—

I have read with attention your "Appeal to those who Think and those who Dare"; also your more recent editorial on "The Conflict of Consciences." Will you grant me space in which to present somewhat different views?

1. In both of these editorials you are stating the general question of "Liberty and Light" as opposed to their opposites. You draw the line in the one as between Christian and anti-Christian; in the other, between Roman Catholic and Protestant. [No: between Roman Catholic and Radical.—Ed.] In the first your "appeal" is to all radicals to be "brave," so brave as to take an anti-Christian stand. You urge them to do this as "friends to liberty and light, science and civilization, truth, brotherhood, and humanitarian religion." You say, "I do but tell you where you are." Then you appear to assure them that in your judgment they are under the spell of a "mental delusion that paralyzes courage, deadens conscience, and darkens the eye of reason." Let me confess that this sentence reminds me of the old-time Christian admonition, "Believe, or"—take the consequences. It has that spirit of infallibility which, to say the least, is not persuasive and pleasing.

2. Imagine a conversation:—

A.—"B, shall I tell you where you are? You are anti-Christian in spite of your dreams to the contrary."

B.—"Explain."

A.—"Well, you are the friend of liberty. Christianity stands arrayed against liberty. If you are on one side, you are not on the other. Devotion to freedom makes us all anti-Christians."

B.—"That depends. With your interpretation of Christianity I should be anti-Christian. With my own, I am not."

A.—"But I say your interpretation is wrong. That is my point."

B.—"My point is that, consistently with my own, I am Christian. Rightly reported, I believe Christianity is liberty. Hence, to be anti-Christian, I must oppose liberty."

A.—"B, there is great intellectual and moral gain to ourselves and great increase of usefulness to the world at large in opening our eyes to the realities of things, and breaking the spell of a mental delusion that paralyzes courage, deadens conscience, and darkens the eye of reason."

B.—"Indeed—very likely. Do you apply the remark to yourself or to me?"

A.—"I mean no offence."

Of course you don't, Mr. Abbot. I understand that. But the tone of your editorial will suggest to many minds, I think, just this fatal conclusion: "Mr. Abbot is not so far outside of that worst phase of Christianity as he supposes."

I see well enough that A—to make A and B serve me a little longer—might go on to show that B's private interpretation of Christianity was of no consequence. "Christianity," he would say, "must be represented by the Universal Church, and not by private persons or factions; and, as thus represented, every friend of freedom must set himself as steel against it."

But what if B responds: "What I array myself against is intellectual and spiritual bondage, against slavery and slavishness of all kinds and descriptions. This was the meaning of Christianity. It has been betrayed in the house of its professed friends. I will oppose your 'Universal Church,' but not it. And I am not led to this position by 'private prejudices' nor 'preconceptions.' It is honest interpretation. As for being 'brave,' I do not raise the question. If I am under 'enchantment,' it is the enchantment of what I believe to be truth. Will not A confess a like bondage?"

3. Now I am not disposed to take sides in this controversy. Finding myself "outside" of all names, Christian, anti-Christian, Free Religionist, or what not, I strive to consider the matter impartially. I care little for names—names are misleading. I would scrutinize the thing named. If B is "Free Religionist Christian," and A is "Free Religionist anti-Christian," what does it signify, if only both are also devotees of "Liberty and Light"? If two men bring me a rose, I suspect it will smell as sweet as though they did not come disputing about its name. If they bring me liberty, I shall care little for "anti" or "not anti." They may split their logic as they please. I want liberty: thanks for that. So, on the contrary, if they come, the one saying, "I am Christian," the other, "I am anti-Christian," and both bring me something else in the place of liberty, I shall say, "Go your ways. I cannot be caught by a name." The test question is, "What are the things you prize?" Settle that, and you have practically settled all.

Human nature crops out in about the same fashion in whatever religion or no-religion, in whatever party or sect. Under the shelter of different names people act pretty much alike. The practical outcome of their lives does not vary so much. It is this naming, this sect-gathering, this party-ranging, that reduces all classes and professions to a common or similar pulp. To speak of the party of liberty is a misnomer, to my thinking. Party falls out with liberty very soon. Let B call himself "Christian," or "extra-Christian." If so be he sees the path of freedom and will persevere therein, he is, as I value him, of far more worth than A, unless A shall in like manner emancipate himself, however emphatic he may make the anti-Christian protest.

4. As regards what you have to say on "The Conflict of Consciences," I cannot well express the degree of my surprise. For the sake of carrying "compulsory education," you appear to be whittling away all recognized principles of freedom. Rejecting Christianity formally, you practically adhere to the very essence of it, as you yourself have described it; so that the difference between your scientific religion and ecclesiastical religion lies only in the shade of color. Your scientific religion bristles with the same kind of coercive infallibility that has distinguished so often the Christian religion. You abolish intuitionism to set up scientificism, and its energizing power is the reserved bayonet. It is all very strange. But the evidence you have volunteered forbids doubt of your intent. Your motto is "Liberty and Light." Nevertheless the liberty and light of others you will set at naught. You justify the State in saying, "If you cannot do as I think best, I am sorry for it, but cannot excuse you. You must pay for what you get—that is, for what I think you ought to have, and propose to furnish." Had not the State better wait until it is asked before it offers its wares, and forces them on unwilling purchasers? "Pay for what I get," says the Catholic; "I get what I don't want." "Ah, but if you are a reasonable being," you reply for the State, "you will admit the justice of my decision." What is this State but the will of the majority? You should rather say "majority conscience" than "enlightened conscience." The "enlightened" part, in considering the question of freedom, you have no business to assume. It is the old, old story, the everlasting oppression of the weak which it is the business of the republic—such is the boast—to prevent.

See how the case stands. Your State says its duty is to see to it that society suffers no detriment; its mission is to defend itself. If it says, "I must have intelligence, and therefore schools and universal education," you eagerly tender your approval. If it says, "I must have intelligence and morality, I must have religion, in order to make my life sure and prosperous, and therefore I must establish both school-houses and churches," you think the liberty of the citizen is invaded, and at once propose a "Liberal League." You can go the school-house, but not the church. I am not saying which is best. I only remind you that there is a difference of opinion it will be well to heed. Others are as conscientiously opposed to your school-system as you are to a church-system. If the one system may be put through in spite of protesting consciences, so may the other. It is a game at which two parties can play with equal right. "Take heed, when ye think ye stand, lest ye fall." SIDNEY H. MORSE.

ADDRESS OF HORACE SEEVER

AT THE DEDICATION OF THE PAINE MEMORIAL BUILDING, IN BOSTON, JANUARY 29, 1875.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—I thank you for your very kind and cordial greeting; and I would observe, in behalf of our committee of arrangements, who have very kindly invited me to perform this pleasing service, that I most fraternally and respectfully bid you one and all a very cordial, hearty, and sincere welcome to our Paine Memorial Building and Home of the Boston Investigator.

I presume I have the honor and the pleasure of addressing an audience composed of different shades of religious belief. But that makes no difference here. You are none the less welcome on that account; for though we may be distinct in opinion, like the billows, I trust that in union or purpose we are one, like the sea. [Applause.] And so, whether you are Infidels, Atheists, Liberals, Materialists, Spiritualists, Free Religionists, Parkerites, Scientists, Evolutionists, Progressionists, Darwinians, Inquirers, curiosity-seekers, or any kind of Christians, native or adopted citizens,—whether you come here from motives of sympathy, desire for instruction, from curiosity, or amusement, we are very glad to see you [applause], and hope that you have come to pass the day and night with us, for we intend to make a night of it. [Laughter and applause.] You will please, therefore, in household phrase, make yourselves comfortable and at home. [Applause.] We here to-day keep open house. We say to nobody "go," but to everybody "come—witness our proceedings, and judge for yourselves what manner of people we Infidels are." We are not very popular at present; but, as we are growing, we can wait and bide our time, believing that one day it will come, because, my friends, we are actuated by the hopeful, cheering, and inspiring motto:—

"Bound to no party, to no sect confined,
This world our home, our brethren mankind,
Be brave, and just, and true to all,
Exalt the right though every 'ism' fall."

And therefore in the liberal spirit of the world-renowned patriot, author, political and religious reformer, whose birthday we have met to celebrate, and whose philanthropic motto was, "The world is my country, and to do good my religion," we meet here, as I trust, on common ground, engaged in a common object, for the benefit of a common humanity.

At last, after years and years of patient, arduous, persevering toil and struggle, of doubt and uncertainty, of hopes and fears, the Infidels of Boston, assisted by their brethren throughout the United States and elsewhere, have succeeded in erecting this splendid edifice in honor of Thomas Paine, the Liberal cause, and the Boston Investigator.

In this noted city of ours, as you are all aware, we have, in Faneuil Hall, what is called the cradle of political liberty. Here in the Investigator and Paine Halls, we hope to have the cradles of mental liberty, without which political liberty is scarcely more than a name, or a charm that lulls to sleep. [Applause.]

As Daniel Webster once said of the Bunker Hill

Monument, allow me to say of this temple of mental freedom: May it remain through future centuries; and as generation after generation come up here, let it always rise, as it were, to meet the sun in his coming, for like the sun it will shine for all. And long after we shall have passed from off the stage of action, may the rosy beams of the morning continue to gild its spires, and the last beams of day linger and play upon its summit.

By the unexpected and most generous bounty of our principal benefactor, James Lick, Esq., of California [applause], together with the donations of sympathizing friends from all parts of the country, we have been enabled to erect this handsome and stately edifice; and now, in the presence of these numerous witnesses, we dedicate it to Truth, to Reason, to Justice, Humanity, Freedom, Equality, Fraternity, Free Thought, Free Speech, a Free Press, to all the rights of man—and all the rights of woman also [great applause],—and to every useful and practical object that can ennoble and adorn, or contribute to the wisdom, improvement, and happiness of our race.

For upwards of forty years the Liberals or Infidels of Boston have been endeavoring to erect a building of this description. My learned and venerable predecessor upon our paper—the honest, the faithful, the incorruptible Abner Kneeland, whose name and memory deserve to be held in grateful remembrance by all the friends of freedom and humanity—attempted to erect in this city a Hall of Science; but it proved a failure, on account of his persecution and imprisonment for blasphemy. More than thirty-six years have rolled away since that event, but I think I see him now, in my mind's eye, as he stood up, a prisoner, in the Supreme Court, with his long, flowing white hair, and dignified and commanding presence, arguing with the serenity of a philosopher, or as the modern Socrates, before the fishmongers of our modern Athens, for the right of free thought and free speech. I also saw Mr. Kneeland when he was confined in the Leverett Street Jail, and as I conversed with him through his dungeon bars, I remember, as though it were but yesterday, that the oath of Jefferson irresistibly forced itself into my mind: "I have sworn," said he, "upon the altar of God, eternal hostility to every form of tyranny over the mind of man." That oath has been to me like a warning and a guide, and I hope that in endeavoring, in my humble way, to follow in the footsteps of our martyred brother, I never have falsified that oath. But Mr. Kneeland's persecutors did not, however, make a Christian of him. No! As it is said of the fabled Jewish children that they passed through the fiery furnace unscathed, so he came from his cell with the same indomitable will and firm resolve, that neither bolts nor bars could break, or even bend. On his release, he left for another and a distant State, and soon after died. And I indulge in no extravagant language when I say, that the Western winds as they float over the prairies chant not the requiem of a nobler man than Abner Kneeland, the founder and the original editor of the Boston Investigator.

After his death, the project of a Free Hall was but little agitated for a number of years. But, as if in confirmation of the doctrine that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church—and of our church as well as others,—another friend set the ball in motion, and to him belongs the high honor of having originated this beautiful building. That friend is my life-long associate, most faithful, devoted, and untiring fellow-laborer, Josiah P. Mendum [great applause], whose many sterling virtues and merits no one knows so well as I do, and no one can possibly appreciate more highly. To him is due the credit of not only originating this stately building, but of sustaining, also, the Investigator and our Liberal bookstore as well.

And now, friend Mendum, old helper and comrade, our golden dream is realized, our ambition to-day is consummated. And since our Chairman has referred to Moses [laughter], allow me to refer to him, too,—odd as it may seem that we heretics should make any allusion to Moses. You remember it is said of him that he only had the satisfaction of looking over into the "Promised Land," but we, more fortunate than he, are on our land and in our building. [Applause.]

But I will not conceal the fact that we have had a long and difficult struggle. It is common among farmers, you know, when referring to a stubborn field, to say that they have "a hard row to hoe;" but then, as Paine said, in the Revolution, "The harder the conflict the more glorious the triumph. For what merit to be dropped on Fortune's hill; the honor is, to mount it." Ours has been an up-hill work, but we have got to the top at last. [Applause.] After almost forty years of incessant toil and struggle, when both of us have grown old and "fallen into the sere and yellow leaf," here we are to-day in the Investigator Hall!—a consummation that in our wildest dreams we could not have imagined. After all these long years of struggle, to know that we have triumphed at last, that now we "sit (as it were) under our own vine and fig-tree, with none to molest or make us afraid!" Like two old ships that have been long tossed upon a stormy sea, buffeted by adverse winds and waves, we at length come into a safe and quiet port, and can now say to the tempests of bigotry, superstition, and priestcraft, "You may roar and whistle now, for we have at last found a safe and pleasant home." [Applause.]

But of all those active friends, who, in the morning of our days, shipped with us, on our long and tedious voyage, you and I, friend Mendum, are almost the only two that remain. And as I look around for the old familiar faces, I think on more than I behold, and I can realize something of the feelings of him who "treads a banquet hall deserted." But this is life, and in view of the thought I can hardly help exclaiming, in the lines of a religious poet:—

"Thank Heaven! no seer unblest am I,
Before the time to tell,—
When next the fleeting year goes by,
For whom the bell again shall swell.
The hoary Mower strides apace,
Nor crops alone the ripened ear,
And we may miss the merriest face
Amongst us, 'gainst another year.
Whoe'er survives, be kind as we have been,
And think of those who sleep beneath the green."

Our brothers who have fallen by the way should not be forgotten; but while we treasure up their names and memories "within the book and volume of the brain, where every day we turn the leaf to read," we are cheered and encouraged with the thought that we still have the kind wishes of at least some of the living. These generous friends who were present at the laying of the corner-stone of our Temple, are here to-day at its dedication, and they show by their presence and respectful attention that you and I are not alone, and that we have not entirely labored in vain. You, my friends, let me venture to say, will be true to yourselves, and help us to carry on the Liberal work for which we have toiled for so many years; and therefore, in conclusion, let me hope that as future generations come up to this Hall they may find, after our work has been done, and we have passed from among the ranks of the living, that

"Here shall the press the people's rights maintain,
Unawed by influence, and unbribed by gain.
Here shall the press its glorious precursors draw, Pledged but to Reason, Liberty, and Law."

And that then, as now, the general invocation shall be:—

"Spirit of Freedom, on!
Oh! pause not in thy flight
Till every land is won
To worship in thy light.
On! till throughout the earth
Thy name shall honored be,
On! till thou reign'st supreme,
Man's heritage by birth."

SUICIDES FROM RELIGIOUS INSANITY.

These clippings from recent English journals are kindly forwarded by an English subscriber to THE INDEX:—

DR. LANKESTER ON TRACT READING.—Dr. Lankester held an inquest yesterday at the Prince Alfred Tavern, Camden Town, on the body of Frederick John Willis, aged sixteen years. Deceased, an orphan, had been ill since Christmas, and until Saturday, the 15th inst., had been in the infirmary at Highgate. On that day, although he spoke in high terms of his kind treatment, he insisted on taking his discharge, and went to his brother's home in Equitable-buildings. He then seemed very comfortable. His brother left him at night time to attend to his business. On returning about midday on Sunday he was surprised to notice a strangeness about him. They went to bed, and about eleven o'clock the brother was awoke by hearing a noise like the dripping of water. On looking into the next room he saw deceased lying in a pool of blood near the fender, with a gash across his throat, and a razor by his side. Notwithstanding every exertion, the hemorrhage could not be stopped, and he expired from the effects of the wound. On the Saturday, when left, he was reading tracts which had been given him by a missionary. These tracts were shown to the coroner, who said that, in his opinion, they would affect a person suffering like the deceased. A verdict of "suicide while in a state of unsound mind" was returned.

SUICIDE FROM RELIGIOUS MANIA.—A girl named Mary Leigh, a domestic servant in the service of Mr. Allenboro, near Peterborough, has committed suicide under rather peculiar circumstances. From the evidence of one of her fellow-servants at the inquest, it appeared that the deceased was very quiet in her manner, and was frequently seen to be much affected while reading the Bible. Without there being anything in her manner leading to an apprehension of such an occurrence, she rose in the night and drowned herself in a pond close to the house. A verdict of "suicide while in a state of insanity" was returned.

"OLD BENDIGO," THE CONVERTED PRIZE-FIGHTER.

This is from a report of a meeting of London cabmen. "Bendigo" is the alias of a converted expugilist and prize-fighter, whose real name is Thomson. His nomme de ring was adopted from his style of fighting:—

"The hymn was a well-known one with, as given out by the preacher, an alteration in the second line thus:—

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow, Praise him for brother Bendigo.

"At the outset Bendigo's enthusiasm was somewhat misdirected, as manifested at an infidel meeting he attended in company with his sponsor. 'Who's them fellows on the platform?' said Bendigo to Jim. 'Infidels,' said Jim. 'What's that?' queried Bendigo. 'Why, fellows as don't believe in God or the devil.' 'Then come along, and we'll soon clear the platform,' said Bendigo, beginning to strip. 'His address, though occasionally marked by those grotesque touches which characterized the remarks of the two preceding speakers, was also not without its pathos. 'I've been a fighting character,' he said, and this was a periphrastic way of referring to his old occupation in which he evidently took great pleasure, 'but now I'm a miracle. What could I do? I was the youngest born of twenty-one children, and the first thing that was done with me was to put me in a work-house. There I got amongst fellows who brought me out, and I became a fighting character. Thirty years ago I came up to London to fight Ben Caunt, and I licked him. I'm sixty-three now, and I didn't think I should ever come up to London to fight for King Jesus. But here I am, and I wish I could read out of the Blessed Book and I could talk to you better. But I never learnt to read, though I'm hoping, by listening to the conversation around me, to pick up a good deal of the Bible, and then I'll talk to you better. I'm only two years old at present, and know no more than a baby. It's two years ago since Jesus came to me and had a bout with me, and I can tell you he licked me the first round. He got me down on my knees the first go, and there I found grace. I've got a good many cups and belts which I won when I was a fighting character. Them cups and belts will fade, but there's a crown being prepared for old Bendigo that'll never fade."

A GERMAN writer told the newspaper readers of Vienna, a short time ago, about a religious play he saw last year in a village in Tyrol. In the first scene was God the Father, clad in a grotesque costume, wearing big leather gloves, and walking up and down on a rainbow, at one end of which was the sun, and at the other the moon. The Creator was smoking a pipe, which he occasionally lit at the two heavenly orbs, soliloquizing all the while. He declared himself very well satisfied with the work he had already done; he had made the world out of nothing, now he would try his hand at making the image of himself. Thereupon came an angel, bringing a huge lump of clay. God the Father put his pipe out of the way, and then with his gloved hands began kneading the mass until he had made a form as near resembling a man as he could make it. Then, after some further manipulations, behind some shrubs, the mass was rolled out again, and God the Father just gave a whiff of breath, and up jumped Father Adam—a handsome youth of the village, scantily clad, who began to dance about on the stage, at which God the Father took up again his pipe and began philosophizing about how he should make the woman. This feat, too, was accomplished in a successful manner by cutting her out of Adam's rib, in the true Biblical method. The play was entitled The Creation.—English paper.

THE ABODE OF A HERO.—Just read how Garibaldi lives at Caprera. He has only three persons with him on the island. First, Monsieur Basso, an old friend and companion in arms; next, a countryman about twenty; and lastly, an old female cook. His dwelling, as is known, is of the most simple kind. The principal room, that occupied by himself, contains only a fireplace, a bed, a few chairs and a sideboard, and in a corner a heap of books. There is also a plaster bust of Colonel Nullo, who died in Poland, and a large portrait in oil of the American General Flores. This is the richest chamber of the house. The island produces plenty of almonds, figs, and grapes, but only a few orange and lemon trees transplanted thither by Garibaldi and cultivated by himself. Goats abound, and there is a considerable number of wild cats. In this kind of seclusion the hero of many revolutions is passing his days. He still retains the fierce and impetuous ardor of early life, which partly explains why he has not long since yielded to the heavy bodily afflictions which have come upon him. Mazzini and many of his other comrades are gone. He must apparently soon follow them.—Morning Star.

A BLOCK IN Dubuque, Iowa, known as the "Bishop's Block," covered with residences and business houses, is owned by the Roman Catholic bishop. Claiming it to be exempt from taxation, he refused to pay taxes upon it. In due time it went the way of other delinquent property, and was sold to a man named Hintrager. Now the bishop is likely to give about half his block to get a clear title to the remainder. The Northwestern University (Methodist) owns several hundred acres of land in Cook County, Illinois, on some of which are built valuable business blocks. It also owns a large area in Evanston which has never paid taxes. The county treasurer having claimed judgment for unpaid taxes upon this property, the university resisted. But the county court decided that under the State constitution no exemptions apply excepting upon property used exclusively for education, and all property held for profit must be taxed. An appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court, which can hardly stretch the exemption principle over property held purely for gain, filching from the people at large to benefit some peculiar creed or organization.

THE Saturday Review bestows the following handsome notice upon one of the popular novelists of the day: "The years come round with their appointed regularity, and we know pretty well what we have to expect. Flowers in spring, weeds in autumn, a transcript of real life told in choice English by George Eliot, a novel of impossibilities hammered out in dubious syntax by Mrs. Henry Wood, larks in the sky, frogs in the pond—we know them all, and accept all with thankfulness or resignation, according to their respective deserts. As for Mrs. Henry Wood's novels, the wisest thing that we can do now is to receive them with resignation. We have done our best to induce her to reconsider her ways, and give the world good work instead of bad; but it is in vain. Mrs. Wood is an institution which changeth not; and mean ideas, vulgar diction, wooden characters, and absurd sensationalism come in regularly as part of the produce of the year."

THE other day a minister offered prayer at the laying of a corner-stone. A brisk young reporter bustled up and said: "I wish you would give me the manuscript of that prayer." "I never write out my prayers," replied the preacher. "Well," said the reporter, "I couldn't hear a word you said." "I wasn't praying to you," quickly responded the parson.

THE MODERN MISSIONARY.

BY MARION V. DUDLEY.

O white wings flying eastward,
O white wings flying west,
O steam-throats speaking blessings
Across the ocean's breast!
Ye are the mighty agents
That link our human hands,
And preach a common heaven
To near and distant lands.

Fair COMMERCE!—groveling priestess,
They say who know thee not,— Thy rising fame shall brighten
Till darkness is forgot;
Earth ever crowns the victor
To whom is honor due,
And hands must twine the laurel
Who plant for thee the rue.

Sweep on, O stately Priestess,
Speed swift from main to main!
Not King nor Nation scorneth
To swell thy splendid train;
The poor ones rise to bless thee,
The lowly and the proud
Alike shall send before thee
Their acclamations loud.

Thou muse of future poets,
Thou prayer we've prayed so long!
Speed on to swift fulfilment
The vision and the song:
Upon the mighty headlands
Where prophet's rainbows play,
Behold, we catch the dawning
And glory of thy day.

Thy silent voice, firm-speaking,
Swung wide the ponderous doors
That hid the sleeping nations
On Oriental shores:
Pacific's "Island Empire"
Unclosed her almond eyes,
And met the new effulgence
With radiant, glad surprise.

And tawny-skinned Celestials,
Behind their mouldering wall,
Shook off their poppy slumber,
And answered to thy call:
Old India, torpid, drunken
With wine of elder years,
Revives to sing the music
Thou'rt sounding in her ears.

In the article of last week on "A Social Nest of Snakes," it should have been said that "Margaret" was left adrift, not seventy, but one hundred and seventy years ago. The evident error in the account which we followed escaped notice till too late.

THE Woman's Journal of January 30 quotes a long passage from the article in THE INDEX of January 7 on "Large and Small Families," and attributes it to "a lady correspondent of THE INDEX"! Is it possible that our neighbor does not yet know that "A. W. S." are the initials of Mr. Stevens? We can certify that he is not a "lady correspondent," but very much of a gentleman; is the Woman's Journal enough of a lady to correct the mistake, and give honor to whom it is due?

THE Journal of Speculative Philosophy for January, 1875, is very true to its name, being filled with articles on the highest philosophical themes, with one or two artistic subjects treated in the same method. Mr. Alcott gives a series of extracts from old philosophers, whose thoughts he has made his own so fully that we seem to hear his voice in all of them. Mr. Snider gives us one of his curiously analytical and unpoetical criticisms of Shakspeare's "Winter's Tale;" and Mr. Chapman a discussion of Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata." Readers acquainted with the philosophical circles of the West will be interested to see the notes taken at the sessions of the Jacksonville, Ill., Plato Club, embodying the views of their leader, Dr. H. K. Jones, on the Immortality of the Soul; while the metaphysical student will turn to "The Theory of Cognition" and Mr. Harris' article on Trendelenburg and Hegel. The short reviews are brief and comprehensive. This new number of the ninth volume of the Journal well maintains its reputation, which is now widely extended. E. D. C.

AGAINST our statement that Christianity and Freedom are irreconcilably antagonistic, the Independent of February 4 quotes Fitzjames Stephens, editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, who predicts a future alliance between the Roman Catholic Church and the Democracy of Europe, anticipates that this Church will strike for a coalition with the democratic and socialistic organizations now so strongly arrayed against it, and refers to the fact that Jesus was a carpenter as a basis of appeal to the working classes. Also Mr. Stephens alludes to the well-known fact that the mediæval bishops often sided with the common people against the feudal barons and kings. If the Independent imagines that there is any information in these trite references, it is greatly mistaken. On the other hand we urge that a carpenter who claims to be absolute Lord and King of all mankind by Divine right is not much of a democrat, and is very unlikely to be made standard-bearer by any democratic party not already gone to seed; and that, like the kings of France, who sided with the people in order to break down the great lords that were the chief obstacle to their own despotic sway, the Roman Church is ready at all times to abet the revolutionists in destroying the modern State, in order to pave the way for its own supreme temporal and spiritual power. But Louis XIV. and the French Revolution that was the reaction against the successful despotism he established show how insincere is this pretence of secular kingcraft to befriend the common people; and if the Roman Church should equally succeed in its attempt at cheating the democrats of Europe, a new and more frightful revolution would expose the hollow pretence that a religion founded on ecclesiastical kingcraft is or can be friendly to popular liberty. The Independent has with astonishing readiness fallen into the trap set by Fitzjames Stephens for all simple-minded liberals; for every well-informed person knows that he is an enemy of modern democracy, even as exemplified in the established institutions of this country.

THE APPEAL TO FACTS.

MY DEAR MORSE:—

Your letter is published in another column of this issue of THE INDEX, and I thank you for its keen and friendly criticism. I know you well enough to be sure that you want a reply as frank and direct, and, without devoting space to unnecessary expressions of the great friendliness and respect I cherish towards you, will begin at once.

1. You find in recent editorials of mine "that spirit of infallibility which, to say the least, is not persuasive and pleasing;" and which "will suggest to many minds just this fatal conclusion: 'Mr. Abbot is not so far outside of that worst phase of Christianity as he supposes.'"

Now I will confess my disappointment at finding myself continually baffled in the attempt to concentrate attention on facts and truths which are wholly independent of my own personality. That seems to me to be my private affair, and not at all profitable or interesting to the general public. But if it will give you or any one the faintest satisfaction, I forthwith surrender at discretion; I plead guilty to the indictment; I confess myself to be insufferably dogmatic, arrogant, opinionated, conceited, vain, puffed-up, despotic, intolerant, self-sufficient, presumptuous, egotistic, a very monster of pretentious infallibility and papal absurdities of all sorts. Not that I am conscious of any one of these things, for I am not. But I am willing to take them all for granted as sins of mine that are patent to all the world except myself, for the sake of putting a stop to an irrelevant discussion in the shortest possible way. So far as the main point is concerned, I don't care a button whether the charge is true or false. In the private confessional of my own conscience, perhaps I care a great many buttons whether or not I am falsifying my own principles in practice; but, the question being one of the real relation of radicalism to Christianity in general, I shall keep my concern to myself. So I confess that I am as much of an infallibilist as you imagine, sunk up to the very eyes in "that worst phase of Christianity." But what of it? Does that confession prove that radicals are not anti-Christians by the intrinsic necessities of their radicalism? I do not see any "fatal conclusion" about it; for, notwithstanding all my mountainous pretensions so unreservedly confessed, I cannot see that the settlement of the general question has anything to do with what I am or am not.

Suppose I come to you in your studio, and tell you that the house is on fire. You "guess not." I repeat with earnestness that it is on fire; that I have seen the flames, and that there is no time to be lost. You then inform me that there is a "spirit of infallibility" in my remarks not "persuasive and pleasing," and pathetically intimate that I am a "Christian," after all. To this I shall only say: "Very well—I waive that point, and confess you have not told half the horrid truth about me. But nevertheless be so good as to step into the hall, and smell the smoke for yourself. We will discuss the infallibility question afterwards." Now I submit that the only vindication I want is your perception that the fact is as I state it. If it is, you will not care to press the charge of infallibility; if it is not, you will be justified in adding several other charges to it. All I want is to secure the appeal to facts, and the withdrawal of attention from all personalities that obscure them.

2. Your imaginary conversation between A and B, in which A speaks for me and B speaks for any one who holds that "Christianity is liberty," is not conducted on A's side with quite the uncompromisingness that I should recommend. After B's statement that "Christianity is liberty," you make A quote a sentence of mine about "mental delusion;" and when B inquires, "Do you apply the remark to yourself or to me?" you make A stammer out, "I mean no offence—" Now, if I were in A's place, I should not so shrink the responsibility of my convictions. I should say to B: "I apply the remark directly to you. When you tell me that 'Christianity is liberty,' I do not hesitate an instant to pronounce that opinion a 'mental delusion' that paralyzes courage, deadens conscience, and darkens the eye of reason." I have not the slightest wish to give you offence, I assure you; but I tell you what I see to be truth, and, if you choose to take a causeless offence at me instead of appealing to the facts of the case to find out whether it is a 'delusion' or not, I shall of course be sorry for the stubborn prejudice and total carelessness of truth you manifest, but shall not pretend to be sorry for any fault of mine in simply telling you the truth as it is." That is the very bigoted, arrogant, and "infallible" reply I should make to your B; I should not be induced to retract, modify, or apologize for a single syllable of the sentence you quote; I should stand by my convictions and take the consequences, hoping that B would take a fresh look at the facts, but not being disturbed if he preferred to berate me for telling him what I see to be true. And, further, I should know that nobody would consider my course as either disrespectful to B or arrogant in itself, who can discriminate between intense conviction and the assumption of infallibility; for recognition of the rightfulness of appeal both from B and from myself to the facts which both B and myself are equally bound to respect is inconsistent with the assumption of infallibility, which denies the rightfulness of the appeal to facts. Whoever admits that his own conclusions are not final, however strongly convinced he may be of their truth, and submits them to the test of facts, holds ground diametrically opposite to that of all pretenders to personal infallibility; namely, the ground of SCIENCE.

This brings me to the chief point in this part of your letter. You assume that B has a valid right in reason to plant himself on his own "private interpretation of Christianity" as distinct from the "Universal Church," and to plead that the sanctity of this private interpretation protects it from criticism or challenge. You assume that A is silenced, if B declares that he arrays himself against bondage and on the side of liberty, admits that bondage was the meaning of Christianity but is so no longer, and therefore sides with liberty when he sides with Christianity. This ground you treat as impregnable, because evidently B has, in your opinion, a right in reason to make his own interpretation of Christianity and to deny any obligation to submit this private interpretation to any superior tribunal.

Now I must hold that this position of B is totally indefensible, and that A is not at all silenced by it. I admit that B's private interpretation is just as good as A's, if men are forever tied up to private interpretations and cannot get beyond them; and I admit that, if A had only his own private interpretation to set over against B's, he could not insist on the truth of his own without making in reality an assumption of personal infallibility. This you imagine I do; this you imagine gives a "spirit of infallibility" to what I have said; and thus you wholly misunderstand the position I really take. But my ground is quite different. Although B's private interpretation of Christianity is just as good as A's, and A's just as good as B's, I hold that neither can be held as valid in reason until submitted to the test of facts and verified by observation and experiment. I appeal from the private interpretations of both A and B to the universal criterion of science. When B so confidently sets up his own private interpretation as an impregnable fortress, A will not set up a rival fortress of his own; he only points out that reason permits no such sacred refuges anywhere, and binds us all to submit to the test of facts. When B declares that Christianity was bondage, but is liberty, and (to make good his paradox) asserts that Christianity "has been betrayed in the house of its professed friends," namely, the "Universal Church," A responds that this can easily be settled by observation and experiment. History, which is only the record of human observations long continued, knows nothing of a Christianity which is not in the Church; experiment, applied to the world of modern life, fails to discover it. When B gives up the Christianity of the Church, he gives up his hold on facts, and loses himself in the clouds of his own imagination. Observation and experiment, historical study and philosophical analysis, find that Christianity is the religion of Christians, and the totality of Christians constitutes the "Universal Church." Not only would A deny possessing a private interpretation of Christianity to offset B's, but he would submit all his conclusions on the subject to the test of facts, which is the test of science; and he would hold himself at all times ready to accept the results of scholarship, criticism, and scientific historical investigation, as the standard by which all his own thinking must be judged. If B has anything to urge in rejoinder, it does not appear in your imaginary conversation.

3. You entirely misconceive the point of the editorials you are criticising, if you suppose I care anything for names except as the signs of things. But I do hold that the names belong to the things, and that private interpretation has no right to disjoin them. You say that you "find yourself 'outside' of all names;" yet you say you "care little for names."

To my thinking, the pains you take to stand "outside of all names" shows quite as profound a concern for them as I have, who profess no unconcern for them, but strive to use them accurately. Are you "outside" of all things as well as names? If not, other people will see that the names of the things you are not outside of belong to you, notwithstanding your disclaimer. You say you are for liberty. Very well: I have no wish whatever to foist any name upon you to which you object. But just so far as you act for liberty the thing, you act against Christianity the thing (as the whole world knows it, excepting only the sporadic B's who think they know more than the whole world). Using the name Christian of all those who act for the thing Christianity, as observation and experiment have made it known, and the name anti-Christian of all those who act against it, how can I help seeing that, scientifically considered, you belong to the latter genus? The botanist does not ask the consent of the plants he classifies; he assigns them exactly the place in the vegetable kingdom to which they are assigned by their organic structure and relations. The philosopher, the historian, the student of opinions, can do no otherwise; and I should as soon protest against being seen as against being named by them. I don't care enough for names to stand outside of them all—which is impossible unless I stand outside of the things they signify; it quite satisfies me if I am only classed where I scientifically belong.

But you say: "To speak of the party of liberty is a misnomer, to my thinking. Party falls out with liberty very soon." Nevertheless, all who act for liberty act together, in a large way; and in a large sense they constitute a party of liberty. As a matter of fact, the liberty you and I enjoy has been won by parties: why not in turn use the same means to win a larger liberty for others? It certainly behooves us all not to let "party spirit" take the place of devotion to the ends for which party should exist; yet I do not think that the jealous individualism which refuses all organized coöperation with others for great objects is one whit more noble than "party spirit." The free man holds his safety in his own hand; he can secede whenever parties become oppressive or unprincipled. I believe in the divine right of bolting; I have bolted more than once; and I share fully your own repugnance to being governed by parties. But I cannot give up parties altogether without giving up all organized efforts for the betterment of mankind; and it seems very selfish to do that. I only wish that men like yourself, who would never seek to govern, but only to assist, were more ready to combine their influence and exertions for human welfare.

4. With regard to the "conflict of consciences," I have looked to your letter for light in vain, and do not know what you would do when consciences conflict. The Catholic school question is one in which no device can meet all the conflicting demands made in conscience' name. The Catholic demands the right to govern the public schools and force his dogmas on the children; the liberal's conscience demands the exclusion of dogmatic instruction from schools supported by general taxation. If the schools are kept up at all, one or the other conscience must be denied; and how are you going to help it? You propose nothing at all. But if I can gather your intent from what you oppose, you would give up the public schools to conciliate the Catholic conscience. Very well: in that case you violate mine. You have got to meet this question of conflicting consciences just as much as I have; and if you can propound a way by which all consciences can be satisfied, I shall be only too grateful for the escape. This letter is too long already, and I cannot now go into a defence of my former position; but I am more than ready to abandon it for yours, if you have a better one. Abolishing the schools or the State is not going to satisfy many consciences, I assure you; certainly not mine. Perhaps I was all wrong; tell me what is right. I do not myself see how to get rid of this school question without violating somebody's conscience, and I would not do that if it could be helped. But it is no solution of the difficulty to re-state it, which is all you have done; I admitted the necessity, in this practical question which must be met practically, of violating somebody's conscience. Now show me how to satisfy everybody's conscience, and it will need no argument to persuade me to adopt your view. When you have taken a position of your own, I can judge whether it is better than mine, but not before.

With cordial friendship yours,

F. E. ABBOT.

MAPS OF WEALTH AND ILLITERACY.

In the report of the United States Bureau of Education for 1872 are two very instructive maps which do not seem to have attracted the attention which they merit. The first represents the United States colored according to its wealth in different degrees of an orange color, and the other shows by shades of black the comparative amount of illiteracy in different States. The first thing that strikes the eye is the close correspondence between the two—the line of least wealth, or a population with less than three hundred dollars per head, following pretty nearly (with some local exceptions) the famous Mason and Dixon line of prohibited slavery; and the line of illiteracy, or a percentage of sixty or over who cannot read and write, coinciding with it yet more fully.

Connecticut and Rhode Island are the most uniformly wealthy States in the Union, while New York rises to the highest grade of all in the Metropolis, and sinks to the lowest in a small spot of the Adirondack region. The only other places numbered as in the highest grade of two thousand dollars per head are on the borders of Lake Michigan, probably the seats of great mining companies.

But while the broad lines of wealth and education are nearly coincident as dividing the Union in halves, we find great differences in narrower local divisions. Maine, which only in a small spot on the coast rises to even the second grade of wealth, is free from the stain of illiteracy, less than five per cent. of her population being unable to read and write; while all of Connecticut and Rhode Island, and very nearly all of Massachusetts, are marked I. or II., these numbers representing five to twelve per cent. of those who cannot read or write. No place in the old free States, save the southern end of New Jersey, falls into the third grade of twenty-five per cent. of illiteracy, and scarcely one in the old slave States rises above it.

These figures seem to be full of meaning, and to show just where the system of public education needs to be fostered and applied more strictly. At the South we need to multiply the simple district school, laying broad a foundation of the mere elements of learning, while encouraging all genuine effort after a higher culture; but in the North we need rather to perfect our work, and to see that its benefits are secured to the class of the population who need it most. It is evidently the large foreign population and the crowded factory regions which keep up the percentage of illiteracy in New England above that of her rural districts; and there seems to be no reason why wise legislation and more flexible methods of education should not meet and conquer this difficulty.

We thank the Bureau for these valuable aids to the study of this subject, and commend them to the attention of our readers.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—There is a much closer affinity between superstition and unbelief than is commonly supposed.

We hear it often said that the superstitious believe too much, while the Rationalists believe too little.

Now, prima facie, the superstitious do believe a very great quantity of marvels and myths, while Rationalists believe next to none at all. The former from this point of view are abundantly credulous; the latter incredulous.

But if we look deeper into the matter, we shall find that the marvels and myths are believed, owing to a want of faith in that which is true, and to an apparent inability to exercise "pure faith," which I define to be, trust in the invisible God.

Take, for example, the superstitious regard for sacred books. The real reason why these books are regarded as the words of Divine inspiration is because men do not believe rationally in a God who can instruct, guide, and console the heart without such a medium. The belief in incarnations, again, springs from the inability to believe in a God who is without visible form, and who is ever present with men. The belief in Atonement is another form of superstition, founded on an utter want of trust in God's justice and love.

Superstitious regard for union with some church as a security against hell-fire can only take root where God is not thoroughly trusted for eternity. The sacramental theory is based upon the untrustworthiness of God, upon the dread of being left to his "uncovenanted mercies."

More especially in the sacramental theory of the "Real Presence" of Christ in the Lord's Supper, this want of faith in the abiding presence of the Most High is glaringly conspicuous.

If the Catholics, Roman and Anglican, only believed God to be ever with them, do you think they would be at the trouble of juggling their bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ?

Passing from Orthodox superstitions to that of Spiritualism, we trace the same feature. It is absolute unbelief in the immortality of the soul, and want of trust in God, which has created this passionate desire to have evidence of continued life after death. Just as the Bible-worshippers piteously cry that, if you take away their Bible, they would have no God left to them; so do the Spiritualists say that without these manifestations of the departed they could not have any ground for a hope of immortality.

The Rationalist, on the other hand, supports my assertion in having given up certain superstitions, not because he believes in and trusts God less, but because he trusts God more. He has relinquished his former reliance on the Bible, because he believes in God himself, and looks to him for help, guidance, and consolation. He has renounced the miracles and myths which it contains, because they diminished, instead of adding to, the real glory and dignity of the Supreme. His conceptions of God are expanded and elevated, and that is why he has abandoned superstitious belief in miraculous interferences and visitations.

He believes God to be so infinitely superior to the very best of men, that it seems to him degrading to believe him to have ever become incarnate.

He relies so entirely upon the justice and goodness of God towards all men, that salvation by union with a church appears both needless and ridiculous. He rejects Atonement on the same ground. By the same pure faith he becomes indifferent to the sacraments, which he has completely outgrown, and would no more use than he would ride through the streets of Boston on his umbrella.

The supposed "Real Presence" of Christ is of as little value to him as would be a farthing taper lighted at noonday. Fear, be it remembered, is the foundation of all superstition; and fear is the antipodes of faith. Faith is confidence, and begets fearlessness; and it is because a man believes in absolute and universal goodness that he is able to be fearless, and to cast aside the superstitions which only fear has engendered.

We may then turn the tables on Orthodoxy and proclaim it to be "infidel,"—infidel in its origin, infidel in its practice, and infidel in its tendency to crush true faith altogether, or to prevent its development.

The author of the New Koran, after paying a most just and eloquent tribute to the great mind of Comte, observes:—

"And now in his latter days the defect of his universal science is seen by Comte himself, as was long ago foreshown by his master St. Simon; and he is bewildered by many things that were left out of his reckoning, and for which he had made no provision.

"And having broken down in his mind the noble image of God, which he cannot tell how to reestablish so as to afford him satisfaction and the sweet sympathy of the just, he must needs go the way of all other idolaters, and set up a worse image of humanity." (New Koran. Counsels III. Vers. : 12, 13.)

The entire absence of faith in God may thus lead to superstitions of the Orthodox or of the opposite kind; nor must we forget that in proportion as our own faith (though it be the purest we can imagine) is necessarily mixed up with conceptions which must be faulty and defective, it may lead us into some kind of superstition unawares; and this thought should effectually prevent us from the very least approach to dogmatism, lest we should be petrifying the very errors which time and growth would have otherwise enabled us to see and to discard.

Were it not pitiable to see clever and cultivated men in abject prostration of mind before a gross superstition, the spectacle of the controversy now raging between Canon Liddon, of St. Paul's, and Monsignor Capel, of the Church of Rome, about the "Real Presence," would be ludicrous.

The Romanist charges the Anglican with teaching Roman doctrine on this point; and the Anglican, while fully admitting and exulting in the performance of the miracle himself, yet wriggles and struggles to prove that the manner in which the miraculous change is effected is differently defined by himself and the Ritualists from the precise terms used by the Romanists. Neither of the disputants dream that they are alike exposing their superstition and their utter unbelief in the ever-present God.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

Literary Notices.

THE TRUE HISTORY OF JOSHUA DAVIDSON, COMMUNIST. Philadelphia: Lippincott & Co. 1875.

I have just reread with renewed interest this beautiful and thrilling story of a Cornish carpenter's son, who from his boyhood attempts to imitate the Carpenter's Son of Nazareth, asks the priests strange questions when he is but twelve years old, devotes himself to teaching the poor and raising the fallen, leagues himself to carry out the latter purpose with the Communists, in whose defeat perishes one of his most active followers, a poor girl named Mary, whom he had restored to virtue and adopted as his sister, while another follower, named John, survives to write his story, after a mob (stirred up by the same priest whom he had long before provoked by asking him, "Why don't you obey the gospel, and give all your money to the poor?") murders him in indignation at his attempt to justify the Commune. So much has been said against the latter body that it is pleasant to read something in its favor, though the author goes no farther than to assert that Communism and gospel Christianity have so much in common that they must be either both right or both wrong. Both are, however, incidentally said to be at variance with social science. The peculiar significance of the names of the chief characters is easily seen, especially when we remember that the Nazarene Carpenter, who called himself the Son of David, was really named Joshua. F. M. H.

WE HAVE accidentally neglected to notice the Prospectus of the Western, sent to us a few weeks ago, a new monthly journal of literature and art to be published at St. Louis.

The Western is to a great extent in the hands of the same gentlemen who have given its high reputation to the Journal of Speculative Philosophy; but we judge from the list of contents of the January number that it is intended to be more popular in its character. Artistic and literary criticism forms a large part of its work. When we have so often reason to blush at a comparison of our own periodical literature with that of England, France, or Germany, we rejoice at every new effort of educated men to raise it to a higher level. Boston has little reason to be proud of her contribution to this department of letters; for although we could name many valuable papers which she has contributed to it, yet she has never long sustained any journal which was both excellent and popular.

The Dial was a remarkable and permanently valuable contribution to the literary history of the country; but it was confined mainly to a special clique of highly cultivated thinkers, and never met the popular need, and was unable to command pecuniary support.

The Radical met a similar fate. The North American Review may now be considered a veteran in the field; but, with all its acknowledged value, its circulation has always been small, and it has never exercised a wide influence. The Unitarian denomination, with its breadth of culture and great amount of talent, has no organ that adequately represents it. The scholarly Christian Examiner met with the same fate as the Dial and the Radical, and Old and New by no means supplies the vacancy. The Atlantic has had greater popular success, but is hardly equal to its New York rivals, not to institute a comparison with European journals.

Perhaps St. Louis is to show us the way to combine thoroughness with brilliancy, and instruction with pleasure, so that the literary life of our country may be fairly represented in periodical literature. If so, we shall hail the Western as a rising star, and hope that its light will shine brightly even to our Eastern shores. E. D. C.

IS IT A SCIENCE OR A SUPERSTITION?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I read with pleasure the remarks which, in your issue of January 14, you appended to the letter of your Canadian correspondent, who thinks THE INDEX admits "too much Spiritualism." Your cheerful—"I don't know, do you?" touching spiritual matters, is philosophical and modest; but your correspondent's "I don't know: neither do you,"—for that is virtually his position—is neither modest nor philosophical. His dictum that there is no "spiritual existence outside of organization" is as much a dogma as any other. He regards it as infallibly true, the affirmative not even worth discussing. But it is too late in the world's history to build upon infallibility, whether the building be erected by Protestant, or by Catholic, or by Materialist.

Your correspondent brings it up as an accusation against us that, in speaking of Spiritualism, "we drag in the word science." Some of the ablest scientific men of the day have done the same thing; Alfred Wallace, and William Crookes, and the electrician Varley, all Fellows of the Royal Society, among the number. Wallace, who shares with Darwin the honor of having first brought to public notice the great principle of "Natural Selection," wrote a ten-page review of The Debatable Land, which was published, without comment, in the April, 1872, number of the (London) Quarterly Journal of Science, edited by Crookes; and the reviewer there speaks of my work as treating "a subject not out of place in a scientific journal; for in whatever light we view it, it is really a scientific question." (It is I, not Wallace, who italicized these last words.) Crookes, by admitting the review under the heading "Notices of Scientific Works" (Scheller's Spectrum Analysis being next after it), endorses Wallace's view of the subject.

This same Mr. Crookes, the discoverer of the metal Thallium, sent evidence, during the spring of last year, to the (London) Spiritualist that Humboldt, not long before his death, at a dinner at which the subject of Spiritualism came up, said: "The facts are undeniable; it remains for science to furnish an explanation of them." (The exact words in the original German were: "Die Thatfachen stehen unneinbar: die Erklärung bleibt der Wissenschaft schuldig.") The attesting witness present on that occasion was Lieutenant-General Count von Lüttichau.

Now, is a matter to be pooh-poohed as unworthy to be spoken of in a rational journal, or contemptuously set aside as a mere nursery superstition, which such men as Humboldt, and Wallace, and Crookes, and Varley—all admitting the facts—think worthy of grave consideration?

ROBERT DALE OWEN.

PHILADELPHIA, January 27, 1875.

P.S.—Since writing the above, I have had brought to my notice Mr. Stevens' editorial on this subject in THE INDEX of January 21. The temper and the style of reasoning of that article are both highly to be commended. Mr. Stevens may not need phenomenal proof of a higher life: yet I hope that so candid a mind as his may not pass from this world without obtaining it. R. D. O.

NATIONAL POLITICS.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—

Love is the moral foundation of just authority, and the desire to exercise the small amount of authority concerned in giving good advice is justifiable only by an earnest good will toward the one on whom it is to be inflicted.

Let me say, therefore, that but for my earnest friendship and esteem for THE INDEX and its writers I should not feel disposed to offer any suggestions as to their course. I must, however, beg them to consider the calm suggestion of a friend, that the influence of THE INDEX might be in some respects much more beneficial than it is. While I do not doubt the conscientious humanity and love of truth in THE INDEX corps, I am painfully impressed with the apparent intensity of prejudice, the partisanship, and the sectional feeling apparent in the political utterances of THE INDEX. That these are based upon sincere convictions as to a series of facts and statistics which I could not refute or assail within the limits that you could give me, I do not doubt; and therefore shall not attempt the statistical refutation of many things you believe, which will not bear the test of authentic figures fairly selected.

I would only ask you to consider a few things. Consider that a friend who is equally familiar with the North and the South, who has never been a partisan, but has been equally ready to censure either section in its wrong doing, and to applaud its good deeds, is pained to see in THE INDEX so great a lack of the impartial and kind consideration of political questions. In the eyes of THE INDEX the people of the South are not of the same moral organization as those of the North, but are a bloody, selfish, vindictive, semi-civilized race, who need to be withheld from daily crime by military power. The members of the Democratic party, too, are like the people of the South, inhuman, corrupt, reactionary, and dangerous to the welfare of the Republic.

Upon these subjects I have impressions from personal intercourse with each section and each party, which are sufficient for myself, and which differ greatly from yours, but which I would not offer to the public. I would not presume to offer any opinions on this subject, not based in positive facts and statistics carefully eliminated of error. On such a basis I would say (what can be proved) that the opinion of the moral inferiority of the Southern people (socially and politically) is an illusion of prejudice which will not bear investigation. An important examination of national statistics, which I made several years since, convinced me (to my surprise) that, instead of moral inferiority, the Southern States may claim moral superiority to the Northern. They have had during the half century past less of crime in proportion to population, and a greater amount of personal friendship, justice, hospitality, courtesy and love in all the relations of life. There are very few Northern men, who have resided a few years in the Southern half of the Union, who are not prepared to confirm this statement by their own experience. Ten years' residence in the South would confirm the editors of THE INDEX in a similar opinion. If we should leave to the negroes of the South (aside from politics) the decision of the question whether they prefer, as friends, Northern or Southern white men, there would be an overwhelming majority in favor of the latter. Though my intellectual sympathies are with the North, where my best friends reside, I cannot deny that in our whole Republic the minimum of crime among white men heretofore has been in the Southern States, the maximum of legislative corruption has been in Northern States, and the maximum of crime in the negro population.

These are very invidious comparisons, excusable only as an act of justice to a much-slandered people. Against such a people, half a century of political contest and misrepresentation has created such a feeling that many of the best people of the North, even the cultured thinkers of THE INDEX, have an astonishing credulity for every evil report—a credulity which attracts and invites the miserable calumnies of such men as Congressman Hays, Gen. Sheridan, Col. Merrill, and many others equally malignant but more obscure.

That the wholesale robbery by political criminals of South Carolina and Louisiana, and the wonderful forbearance of their people, excite no sentiment of justice in noisy Methodist congregations at the North is not surprising; but when the enlightened editors of THE INDEX (credulous to every slander) sneer and scoff, but never speak a word for the oppressed and plundered citizens of the South, one may well despair of a republic whose citizens can be so estranged from each other, so dead to the noble sentiment of Solon.

When strangers from the North, and men of opposite politics, speak in behalf of the robbed, THE INDEX does not respond. When a Republican judge in South Carolina says of the white people in that State "that no English-speaking people have been subjected to like infliction since the Saxon wore the Norman collar," surely, if judgment has not "fled to brutish beasts," the editors of THE INDEX will at least cease to denounce the Southern victims, and speak a manly word for impartial justice, or else leave the foul field of politics, and remain henceforth in their own nobler and purer field of labor, for which their pages are entirely too narrow, even when all irrelevancy is excluded. J. R. B.

LOUISVILLE, Ky.

[Our correspondent is respectfully requested to quote from the editorial utterances of THE INDEX a single word of condemnation, reproach, or sectional prejudice against the Southern people as such—a single word tending to show that "in the eyes of THE INDEX the people of the South are not of the same moral organization as those of the North, but are a bloody, selfish, vindictive, semi-civilized race who need to be withheld from daily crime by military power." We have repeatedly condemned the dishonest Republican governments of the Southern States, as all our readers know; and we have repeatedly condemned the acts of violence committed without local protest against the black people of the South. We deny absolutely all sectional or partisan feeling on these subjects; but we avow emphatically an intense desire to see the equal rights of all, white, black, or yellow, universally respected and protected in the South as well as in the North. The religion of equal rights is the religion of this paper; and it is opposed to any party, either in religion or politics, which opposes equal rights. But it has never made any wholesale condemnation of the South, or expressed the slightest bitterness against it. It wishes well to South, North, East, West alike, and does its best to advance the cause of equal rights the whole world over. If that gives offence, we cannot help it, and must take the consequences.—ED.]

DO WOMEN WANT TO VOTE?

AVOCA, N. Y., Feb. 1, 1875.

MR. ABBOT:—

It is well enough to discuss woman's right to the ballot, and there is something to be said on both sides of the question. But it is also well to inquire whether woman desires the ballot. Of my female friends not one in ten wants to vote. And they are not "slaves" who have been crushed with the burden of servitude: they are intelligent women, cultured some of them, and do know what they do and do not want, and can give a reason. If they truly represent the sentiment of the women of our country—and I do not doubt that they do,—then it seems to me that the effort to enfranchise woman is wasted energy. It may be possible to make a clear case in her favor as to her right, but if she will not have it, what then?

Women never have asked, anywhere, to share with men their political privileges and duties, they do not ask it now, and it is my personal belief they never will. In the "good time coming" there will be no political duties, for each will be a law unto himself; meantime women will continue to believe that politics is not their "sphere." They dislike it. "It's ag'in' natur." The peculiar womanliness of the sex does not harmonize with it. All this in a general way. I do not forget Wyoming, and I cheerfully recognize the fact that some noble women ask for the ballot. I commend them for their devotion to what they think is right. They speak for their sex, but they are self-appointed, and their acts are repudiated. If this is doubted, let readers of this article get an "expression" from their lady friends, and see how it is. If nine-tenths of the women demanded suffrage instead of refusing or being indifferent, I believe they would get it without delay. The greatest obstacle in the way of suffrage for woman is woman herself; the strongest argument against it is drawn from her attitude in relation to the question.

But if women voted as generally as men, I cannot see one good reason to believe that results as to parties and measures would be materially changed thereby. Such full vote, however, it is obvious could never be obtained. The maximum ratio would be approached slowly. It would take years before women would overcome their innate repugnance to such business sufficiently to permit their general voting, if indeed they ever would. In the interim there would be danger. At first a few independent women—those who now ask for the ballot—would vote, and they would vote rightly because intelligently. They would meet at the polls a much larger number of women their opposites in character and qualification, while the great mass would remain quietly at home. It requires no acute discernment to see what vital interests would be likely to suffer from the preponderance of this element at the polls.

And this danger would be constant, though it would become less than at first. We see how it is with men,—many of them will not vote, and there is danger in the fact, for these are almost to a man qualified to vote understandingly, and would speak, if at all, for good government and good morals. If women were voters this class would ever be very much larger among them than among men. Thus the aggregate effect would be bad.

Now why shall we take this risk? Why not "let well enough alone"? Women suffer no peculiar hardships. They are subject to the same laws as men, and their property is taxed neither more nor less than men's. The women who do not want the change have a right to be heard, especially so seeing they are immensely in the majority. The few cry, Equality and Justice! and the words are a talisman to open the hearts of Americans, to their honor be it said. But I have heard of men's standing so straight that they leaned backwards. History records where license came at the call for Liberty, and "Justice" was inscribed above the bloody jaws of the guillotine!

The proposed change is far-reaching and fundamental, and I am firm in the conviction would not be justified by a wish to give the ballot to the comparatively few women who desire it. The possible good would not nearly equal the probable evil. This may seem a cold-hearted arguing away of the sacred rights of these women. Then in the seeming it is, for I know I do profoundly respect human rights. But without more or less surrender of our personal rights, civil government is impossible. It seems hard that an intelligent, educated young man twenty years old is forbidden to vote. But it is the best we can do. He may be better qualified to vote than many men double his age. And of lawful voters, the wisest man is on a level at the polls with the most ignorant. And after the voting is done, it turns out that nearly one-half are practically disfranchised, for the majority have the power, and the minority become as—women.

Now who can contemplate these and cognate facts, and not see that ideal justice and equality are unattainable in political adjustments? They should be approached as near as possible, all things considered,—in other words, as near as is expedient. I am not afraid of the word. The best form of civil government is an expediency, and the wisest men study expediency all their lives.

If the time shall ever come when women ask for the ballot with something approaching unanimity, and if their wish is gratified, it will relieve men from the imputation of an ungallant imposition of unwelcome burdens on unwilling shoulders; and it may also be taken that they are qualified for the service which they ask to assume. Meanwhile, as a matter of expediency, the few women who now desire the franchise must continue "to labor and to wait," for all I can see, and it may be the future will justify to them the faith they have in their cause.

F. H. G.

SHOULD ALL PRAYING CEASE?

IN THE INDEX of January 1, there appeared an article headed "The Week of Prayer," wherein the well-known and able writer answers this question unhesitatingly and decisively in the affirmative. He speaks of "faith in prayer as a means of obtaining mental, moral, spiritual, or social gifts" as being "practically immoral, and immoral in proportion to the vitality of the faith." No distinction is apparently made between one kind or spirit of prayer and another, or between a faith in its efficacy which commands itself to the intellect, as well as the heart, of wise and good men, and that which is manifestly blind and irrational.

Sad as it would be to many never again to bow in supplication before the Supreme Spirit, whose name they lisped in childhood as they knelt by the mother's knee, and to whom, through all life's changes and trials, they have continued to look up in trustful appeal, no one who realizes that loving God means honestly seeking and faithfully using all attainable truth will shrink from the sacrifice, when once assured that reason demands it.

But is it true that, if we would be rational, we must regard the strong and sometimes irresistible impulse felt by the purest and noblest souls, in all times and in all lands, to seek, through earnest supplication, help and strength from Divine sources, as a delusion, hurtful if yielded to, and originating in superstitious ignorance?

Can it be that while the little child may, in its need, ask and obtain help from earthly parents, we, who are as little children in our weakness and blindness, may not ask anything of our heavenly Father, trusting that he will hear and aid? And are there, in truth, no "ministering spirits" who, through natural laws, may, at least, exert a sustaining and strengthening influence, like that which sometimes comes to us (if on earth we be not friendless) through words of counsel and of love uttered by our fellow-mortals—like, but more direct and unfettered in its power than spoken words can ever be? Is this, too, a dream and a foolishness which we must shake off in order to become wise? Are we acted upon daily by direct influence and influx from spirits in the flesh, and is there none which comes to us from, or through, those who have dropped its fetters?

No one can really pray who does not so earnestly and actively will that which he asks as to make every effort in his power to obtain it. Prayer is but one means, and we can no more avail ourselves of that one, while we neglect all others which have been given us to use, than we can run without exerting both the will and the muscles.

He prays well who lives well (or at least who desires and strives so to live), and who, having the opportunity, bends all his energies to the fulfilment of his highest aspirations.

As to the supplication for help, in cases where our own unaided efforts are unavailing, being wrong and hurtful,—if he who is sick implores healing aid from one able to afford it, whether by the administration of medicine or by that "laying on of hands" (often far more effectual) which is physical influx spiritually directed, between man and man, and if, asking, he should obtain the needed help, would the seeking it be reprehensible? And, if not, why does it become so when the agencies employed are different? In either case we receive all things, primarily, from the Infinite Source of life and love; and may we ask and receive needful assistance when it comes through certain channels, and must we refuse to do so when the means employed to reach us are different?

Because we may entreat and obtain help in our need when our own best efforts fail, it does not follow that we may, or can, be at once so inactive morally as to leave our own proper work undone (hoping to get "the best gifts for the asking"), and yet be able to lift the soul up in true, vital, availing supplication. I do not believe that, so long as we leave one stone unturned to accomplish the desired end, it is possible really to pray for help in gaining it.

Every chord of the soul must be stretched to its utmost tension by the mental and moral energies which war with evil and struggle for the right before those energies can culminate in prayer—prayer in its most exalted and perfect acceptance.

If the strings of that living harp whose harmonies may pierce the heavens hang neglected and relaxed, they cannot vibrate in accord with those unseen instruments that can only respond when in unison with them.

Who can really pray against a sin who does not, at the same time, strive with all his might to conquer it? No real prayer is possible when the mind and heart are in a condition so inert and indifferent as this practical inaction implies. But when we both strive and pray, I do, with my whole soul, believe that we receive actual and direct help, the value of which only those can estimate who have experienced it, and which no words can express, far less exaggerate.

Why should it be a delusion to imagine that, in lifting the mind and heart up towards the source of all good and all power, we receive therefrom, as from a fountain which we approach with thirsting lips, refreshment and strength?

Because work has its proper place and we cannot live true life without it, does it follow that there is no place for prayer?

If never anything beside, may not spiritual nourishment—a satisfaction of the soul's inmost and craving hunger—come through direct communication with that which is above us, just as truly as we are fed by the influences which surround us in and through our daily life?

Wise and virtuous men and women have believed, and have had their faith strengthened by life-long experience, that in asking for strength and light, for aid "moral and spiritual," they have been heard and answered, and that through prayer they have gained a power to do, to endure, and to resist, attainable in no other way. But they well know that this availing prayer is possible only when, with soul-deep earnestness, they determine to obey and to do in all things the will of God, so far as in them lies,—that true prayer cannot emanate from a spirit which is inactive, self-indulgent, or uncharitable towards any fellow-being.

The laws which govern the action and reaction of prayer are as real and as stringent (whatever its possible scope or potency may be) as any others which control and limit our being and doing, our giving and receiving. And when these laws are understood and obeyed (and many obey them instinctively without understanding them), then do we learn to regard prayer rationally, as a duty because a divinely appointed means, and as a high and holy privilege because, through experience which will not be gainsaid, we find that its results, far from being "disorganizing" or "immoral," are purely beneficial and exalting—good, and not evil, as in all which comes to us through the working of natural laws, whether material or spiritual, when we act in conformity with them, seeking and desiring, above all selfish considerations, that which is highest and best.

THE CAUSE OF BELIEF.

Christians exhort unbelievers to embrace immediately the tenets of their faith, with an earnestness that shows that they consider belief of this character the product of an arbitrary will. Indeed, all Christian churches teach that through the power of volition all rational persons can believe the essential doctrines of their faith, and that those who remain sceptical are wilfully seeking "darkness rather than light." This proposition, that belief in religion is subject to the will, though in conflict with the facts of every mental experience, and contrary to the most rational philosophy of human nature, is the very life and soul of the bigotry and intolerance of modern Christianity. It is this dogma, founded on ignorance of the philosophy of belief, that still arrays Christianity against heresy, and inspires the churches with the spirit of persecution. "Ye will not believe" is the summary argument of Christians in answering the most invincible sceptic.

Suppose I should go to my Christian friends, and tell them that I believe the "Fountain of Youth" is no fabulous story; that in some unexplored region this fountain of life is welling forth its rejuvenating waters, waiting for some fortunate adventurer to reveal its immortal virtues to dying mankind; and I solicit them to go with me in search of this magical fountain. When they refuse to believe my dream, and attempt to convince me of my hallucination, I reproach them for their obstinate unbelief, and tell them they do not wish to save themselves and their fellow-men from pain and death. Should I act less rationally and kindly toward them than they do toward me, when they accuse me of perverse wickedness for not believing their doctrine of salvation, which they do not attempt to prove by rational evidence? I might adopt the Christian dogma of voluntary belief, and argue that, though my faith in the existence of this wonderful fountain were a delusion, still, as it afforded satisfaction to be thus deceived, they should believe with me and be happy. If we can believe anything we wish, why not believe all the delightful fancies the mind can conceive? How many persons are now suffering from the most painful doubts concerning a future existence, who would gladly believe in immortality, if they had rational evidence to support this faith? Why do not such persons expel their doubts, and find the peace they covet in a voluntary belief of this doctrine, if this is possible?

This false idea of the cause of belief is the source of that bitter, inveterate enmity that characterizes the attitude of the Christian Church toward free thought. It degrades the moral grandeur of honest doubt into obstinate mendacity, and, in the name of the holiest truth that mankind has learned to revere, it leads a pious fanaticism against the most sacred rights of mind and conscience. From this religious tyranny it is comforting to turn and contemplate "The Coming Religion," which Mr. Abbot has so beautifully described.

APROPOS OF THOMAS PAINE.

CONWAY, Mass., Jan. 26, 1875.

DEAR INDEX:—

Your first number of Volume Six was received with a mental greeting ineffable. It is just what is indispensably needed—at least it was a cordial calmer to the anxious aspirations of an octogenarian. While reading "The Coming Religion," an incident was vividly brought to my recollection, that occurred some thirty years ago. At that time I was engaged in Boston in the printing business—connected with which was the printing of a large number of newspapers and periodicals. Among the matter that came under my observation was the correspondence of Thomas Paine with those to whom he sent copies of his revised edition of the Age of Reason near the last of the eighteenth century. Various were the views expressed of the work; some congratulated him for his moral courage, while others reviled him in no measured terms of reproach for his blasphemy. Among those who remarked upon the missive was an eminent statesman, who afterwards received the highest honors that the nation can confer. His expressions were to this purport: "Mr. Paine, a copy of your book is before me; I have perused it with a mingled feeling of astonishment and regret. I confess that the avocations of a large portion of my life have prevented me from giving that attention to the Bible which probably ought to have been given to a book that holds so high a place in the estimation of a large portion of the civilized world. Yet I was not prepared to be informed of the absurdities, contradictions and anachronisms that you have obviously pointed out. Still I very much regret, on your account, particularly, that you have sent forth the book to the indiscriminate gaze of a large mass of religious people who have none other than an implicit belief in the dogmas they have embraced. Again you have given a lacerating blow to the dearest and most cherished interest of the clergy—their temporal power. The different religious sects, whose belief is founded on the Bible, no matter how malignantly ferocious they may have been towards each other, will become a unit to form a power to destroy your influence, and render you odious in social intercourse, and they will succeed; notwithstanding you may have planted a seed which eventually will produce a tree that will bear fruit that shall be for the healing of the nations; and, although for a time your name may be a reproach and a 'cause for hissing,' yet it is not unlikely that the child is now born who shall live to see a monument raised to your memory." This prophetic suggestion, clothed in appropriate phrase, may be fittingly quoted in the discussions at the dedication of the Paine Memorial Building. It is at your disposal.

Yours,
ABNER FORBES.

OUR "Free Religious Society" over on the "West Side" of Chicago had been in existence six months before it concluded to inquire, "What is Free Religion?" It is now having a protracted and desperate wrestle with that question, which bids fair to prove too much for the wrestlers. It seems too large to be grasped by the average intellect of a Free Religious society. Every member of this association knows that he is a Free Religiionist. Perhaps half-a-dozen of them can agree in determining what Free Religion is not, but when it comes to declaring what it is, no two of them seem able to agree. These denouncers of all creeds seem to be hunting for a creed. If they should find one, and stick to it, it might help them. If they should find and adopt one, and then allow every subscriber to it to think, and talk, and teach as he pleased, their condition would not be improved, and they would soon be under the necessity of re-debating the question, "What is Free Religion?" for a "period limited only by the duration of human life." There is a moral in all this which is left to be appropriated by those who need it.—Chicago Presbyterian.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, 10c per line.
 "13 " 25 " 8 " "
 "26 " 51 " 6 " "
 "52 " " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

"Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers. Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,
 has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
 PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 6 cents; 12 copies 60 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. ABBOT. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.HORTICULTURAL HALL*LECTURES

FOR 1875.

The Committee of the Free Religious Association, in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons, again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below,—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged:—

RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, 139 Federal St., Boston.
HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston.
CHARLES K. WHIPPLE, 19 Pinckney St., Boston.

REASONS FOR USING THEEUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

GREAT WORK.

PROPHETIC VOICES

CONCERNING AMERICA.

By CHARLES SUMNER.

Aside from its literary and historical merits, this volume has a special interest, from the fact that it was the last work on which Mr. Sumner was engaged before his death.

"PROPHETIC VOICES" will be found of great value to all who take an interest in the history of our country, so full is it of passages in which the unexampled prosperity of our land has been foretold by philosophers, poets, statesmen, and orators, of whom the lamented author has also given interesting sketches.

3. THE ANTAGONISM OF CHRISTIANITY TO CIVILIZATION.
4. THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

Other lectures also on interesting subjects.

I am willing to go West, if an engagement can be made for a sufficient number of lectures to make it an inducement; and to settle with any liberal society on terms mutually satisfactory.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———. Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement when adopted by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article; and appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THE BILL providing for compulsory education in Maine has passed the Senate, but has not yet passed the House.

AT THE last meeting of the Second Radical Club, Mr. Charles E. Pratt read a very interesting paper on "The Inward Light," as held by the Quakers.

REV. S. P. PUTNAM says he "does not consider Mr. Abbot anti-Christian, except in the use of the word." Suppose he should ask Christianity what she thinks about it herself?

THE RADICAL CLUB had a very good meeting last Monday. Mr. C. P. Cranch read the essay, and Mr. Potter, Dr. Clarke, Mrs. Cheney, Mr. Gannett, Mr. James, and others, joined in the discussion.

"THE unanimity of the ignorant, the disagreement of the inquiring, the unanimity of the wise"—these have been well declared to be the three stages of the process through which mankind must necessarily pass in order to become civilized.

CANON IVERS, a Catholic English priest, protests against "allowing" apostates like Hyacinthe and Dollinger to call themselves Old Catholics, or Catholics of any sort. Inasmuch as their grievance is the Pope's infallibility, he proposes to dub them "the Fallibles."

THE MORAL Education Society will meet at Wesleyan Building, Bromfield Street, Room 19, to-morrow, Friday, P.M., at 3 o'clock. Essay by Mrs. C. E. Streeter. Subject: "A Practical Conversation with Mothers and Daughters—the Mothers to be." All are invited.

THE Christian Register says: "Able and appropriate lectures on 'The Evils of Prohibitory Laws,' 'The American Theory of Government,' &c., &c., have been delivered on recent Sunday afternoons, at Horticultural Hall, before the Free Political Association." The Register, like the pro-slavery Christians of other days, wants to "keep politics out of religion."

"DID I," says the Boston correspondent of the New York Tribune, "ever give you the Rev. Petroleum V. Nasby's definition of the Radical Club? He said it was 'the Den of the Unintelligible, where they talked of the Unknowable.' Boston hasn't been a safe place for the reverend gentleman since then." A good joke is like Holy Writ—there is no answering it.

THE Golden Age, because we persist in opposing the fundamental principles of Christianity, indulges itself in the stale talk about "throwing stones at our mother's head." Now, 'pon honor, we think this "mother" business is a little overdone. To adopt this loose metaphor for the moment, Humanity, not Christianity, is the only "mother" in the case. But the Golden Age cannot distinguish its own mother from her last year's bonnet!

"THE SCRAMBLE among a certain class of ministers," says the Christian Union, "for the office of Chaplain to the Massachusetts Legislature is said to have excited general disgust in that body. Some of the candidates employed runners to button-hole members at their homes, and the wire-pulling was simply disgraceful. It is consoling to reflect that not one of these self-nominated candidates succeeded, the office having been bestowed upon a clergyman who had too much modesty and self-respect to seek it. Such a scramble as was witnessed in this instance is calculated to do more to bring religion into reproach than the office itself, however wisely filled, can do to honor it." How much longer will the people submit to this farce of "chaplainships"?

PROFESSOR W. DENTON and Mr. J. W. Pike declined to take part in the dedication of the Paine

Memorial Building, because Mr. Moses Hull, a noted advocate of "free love," was announced among the speakers on that occasion. The Investigator publishes their notes, and replies that "the Spiritualism of Professor Denton, the Materialism of B. F. Underwood, the Free Religion of F. E. Abbot, Protestantism, Catholicism, Judaism, or any other ism, including the Social Reform theory of Moses Hull, will have a hearing in the Paine Building." We do not see any other consistent view of the matter, so far as advocates of the right of free thought and free speech are concerned. Undoubtedly we differ from Mr. Hull quite as earnestly as Mr. Denton or Mr. Pike; yet the fact that he was to speak on that platform did not appear to us a reason why we should refuse to speak on it. If the "free love" theory is true, it ought not to be denied a hearing; if (as we believe) it is false, it will talk itself down. But the principle of free speech must be respected on every free platform; and it is quite time to understand that, on a free platform, every speaker must be judged by his or her own words alone.

LAST WEEK we were present by invitation at a private residence, near Boston, in which there were very remarkable "manifestations"—the occasion being strictly private and no money being taken by the performer. At the front opening of a small box, which rested on a very light three-legged table with screens at a considerable distance behind and on each side of it, hands were very distinctly shown, and allowed to be touched by many of the audience; fresh flowers were produced and handed to the audience; two or three different faces were distinctly exhibited; and, blank cards being sealed in blank envelopes by several persons in the audience and placed in the opening, immediately envelopes addressed to the same parties, enclosing cards with messages and their own autographs wonderfully well imitated, were returned to them. The peculiarity of the exhibition consisted in the fact that all these astonishing "phenomena" were produced avowedly by natural means and independently of "spirits." Although the means used were not explained, they were divined by a few sharp-sighted observers; and the audience dispersed with a unanimous conviction that no "spiritualistic" hypothesis was necessary to account for such "manifestations" as these.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, JR., in an able lecture on "Stock-Watering" delivered in Boston last Friday, is reported to have said that, notwithstanding all appearances to the contrary, "a rude average had resulted under which the community had paid a fair profit only [of about seven per cent.] on the whole capital which had been actually invested in its railroad system." He denied that "the burden of increased dividends on the strong lines fell on the movement of commerce from the West to the seaboard. Competition did and would prevent its falling there, and would force that carriage down to cost. That burden fell on the local business of the great lines, and showed itself in keeping those living on those lines but little better off than their neighbors." These statements should be carefully pondered and inwardly digested by the Grangers. Mr. Adams also said: "The issue of railroad stock should be freely permitted, but only under public supervision. The difficulty was in the unwillingness of people to be logical. They want the railroad to be at once a public institution and a private corporation. If it is to be a public institution, it must in so far be under public supervision. How long it will take to draw this line, the lecturer could not say; we were as a community just closing the work of railroad construction, and entering upon the study of railroad administration." The unwillingness of people to be logical! That phrase explains nine-tenths of all public difficulties, whether in business, politics, or religion.

Let us test the soundness of this criticism by looking at the actual antagonism which arrays Free Religion against Christianity, and opposes Science to Religion. There is no need of giving here the history of the Free Religious movement in this country. Every one at all conversant with that history knows that the constitution of the Free Religious Association invites to its membership "all persons interested in 'pure religion,' in the 'scientific study of theology,' and in 'fellowship in the spirit.'"

It is well known, also, that some earnest and zealous believers in Christianity have at different times joined this Association, and taken part in its meetings. At the same time it is no secret that many of those who have been most prominent in this Association have disclaimed the Christian name, regarding Free Religion as a movement to merge Christianity, together with every other special religious faith, whether Buddhism, or Mohammedanism, or Judaism, into something which is not Christianity, but, it may be, a development of Christianity into that which is larger and better than Christianity itself ever was, or by itself could ever become.

Now our attitude as Unitarian Christians towards this Free Religious movement depends, of course, upon what we understand to be its "platform." If by that platform is meant only the above-quoted article of the Constitution of the American "Free Religious Association," then there is, as Mr. Savage asserts, "no harm in it." But in this case there is also no more antagonism between the "Free Religious platform" and Unitarianism than there is between the principles of Methodism and an "Evangelical Alliance," or a "Young Men's Christian Association," or than there is an antagonism between the citizenship of our Minister to Great Britain and his observance of the etiquette of diplomatic intercourse while he is at the Court of St. James. If the "Free Religious platform" has that extent, and no more, we can all unite with Mr. Savage in asking, "What harm is there in it? Who or what will suffer by it?" But if the platform of Free Religion (not, be it observed, the platform of the Free Religious Association), as constructed by the public teachings of the able men who, by common consent, are recognized as Free Religionists, has in it certain planks of a very different sort, which have been built into it for a very different purpose than that of promoting the "scientific study of theology," it may be well for us to stop and consider the real significance of such a platform before we jump upon it and cry out, This, too, is "Christianity Notwithstanding." The square issue which Free Religion makes with Unitarian Christianity concerns the principles on which, from the beginning, Unitarianism has been based, and the logical results of those principles to-day. Where, then, as a matter of fact, has Unitarianism laid the emphasis of its denials and its affirmations? According to Mr. Potter, on the two principles of the right of free inquiry and character more important than creed. Logically, therefore, he says Unitarianism ought now to take the next step forward to free and universal religion. But I question the accuracy of Mr. Potter's reading of Unitarian history. He himself frankly admits that Unitarianism "has always been under the influence of Christian traditions, and has held more or less strongly to the doctrine of a special authority in Christian revelation." But more than this, the vital inspiration and genuine strength of Unitarianism has always been, not its passively yielding to the influence of Christian traditions, but its positive and emphatic affirmation of the religion of Christ in its pure and personal essence, free from all erroneous interpretations, and separated from all aftergrowths of dogma or of ritual. Unitarians have, it is true, zealously maintained the right of private judgment, the dignity of human nature, and the use of reason in religion. But they have never subordinated the end to the means, have never thought that freedom in truth-seeking is better than the truth itself, nor in their boldest searchings have they ever once lost sight of the supreme worth and importance of the Christian character and the Christian life. The Unitarian movement is neither historically nor logically a movement away from Christianity, but a movement towards its central truths, its life-giving teachings, its permanent essence. All its denials have been denials of the mistaken statements, or the partial interpretations, or the injurious accretions which Christianity has been subject to in its course through history, by its contact with human philosophies, prejudices, and passions. Now for any one to say at this period in the history of Unitarianism that the Christianity which affirms the great ideals of Jesus, and joyfully acknowledges the "life-impulse he gave the world," is logically consistent with the Free Religion which bids us rise above such "provincial claims" and such "theological narrowness" to the plane of a "world-wide and universal" faith, is to say that there is something higher than "the truth," and something better than "the life," and something broader than "the way" that came through Jesus Christ.

The undeniable right of every individual to make "an absolutely free search for truth" is not paramount to the duty of defending those truths which, by virtue of his very position (if freely chosen), the recognized teacher of any faith is pledged to defend. Even the teacher of "Free Religion" is limited by his own definition of what religion is. Mr. Savage's fine sense of manly honor deprived him of the liberty to remain in an evangelical pulpit after his free search had led him to drop his former Orthodoxy. Will he not agree with me in saying that the "Christian" teacher who has taken the liberty to drop the Christian name is no longer free (as men of the world would declare, is "in honor bound" not) to remain in a Christian pulpit; while if he should "advance" so far as to drop his belief in God he could remain a teacher of "Free Religion" only by first coining a very new definition of a very old word?

The attitude of Unitarian Christianity is, then, positively and emphatically antagonistic to Free Religion, so far as Free Religion carries in its movement the denials of what Unitarianism affirms. We may not, indeed, deny the Christian character of any man who displays those moral and spiritual elements of character which are distinctively and preëminently Christian; but we are not on this account compelled to erase the plain distinctions which separate those who own from those who disown the spiritual authority of him from whom alone the name Christian is derived. The division is not a division of character, but simply of affiliation. But I hold that it is a division as radical and as fundamental as that which separates the Catholic who holds to the Church of Rome from the Protestant who has broken away therefrom, and divides the Protestant of the evangelical school, who says, The Bible is my religion, from the Protestant of the liberal school, who says, The spirit of life in Jesus Christ is my religion. And all this may be said not to disparage the moral worth and spiritual excellence of believers in a religion which, as they think, is freer and better than Christianity, but simply to keep actual differences of aim and purpose from being blotted out or hopelessly confused, to the injury of all concerned. And those who say it will be found ready at all times to acknowledge and commend the true words and good works of all who, in whatever name, and under whatever guidance, help the race forward, and uplift human souls to heavenly rest.—Christian Register, Feb. 13.

A HEATHEN PROTEST.

A CHINAMAN ON CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY EFFORTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CHRONICLE:

Sir,—I noticed in your daily of January 4 a most excellent article entitled "Charity Begins at Home," in which some remarks concerning my countrymen occur. Allow me to say that my people are perfectly satisfied and contented with their lot here if let alone; but there is too much interference with their affairs, especially by the Christian people. We want them to let us alone, not only in our own country, but here also. The Christian religion is not the only religion in the world, although it makes such a bluster about being the correct one. It is "great I and little you." In point of numbers or wealth it is far in the minority, and probably ever will be; and yet it is ever attempting to force its peculiar and, to us, abominable belief upon those who not only do not desire it, but to whom it should look up to as a father. Their religion makes all our Eastern nations quarrel with each other, plants the seeds of contention and trouble where all was peace before; then, no wonder people are angry and rise in their might and slay every missionary in their midst. Your own countrymen would do the same under the same circumstances. Long after our nation, as a great and mighty empire, was, as it were, in its manhood, the Christian religion was a baby in its swaddling clothes, while now it gravely assumes to send men and women to "teach its father" or elder brother how to live and die. To us as a people this looks contemptible indeed, and we look upon them simply with disgust. Let us suppose that our Chinese Empire should send its missionaries to the United States on purpose to convert you "outside barbarians" to our religion, and go about it earnestly and systematically; what would be said? What would be done? Do not tell me we could do it quietly and without serious opposition. Not only jeers and taunts would meet us at every turn, but the press and pulpit would vie with each other in denouncing us, and our very lives would be in danger. They would cry, "Our holy religion is menaced!" But is not ours sacred to us? "But," says the Christian, "you are wrong and we are right. You heathen nations are not competent to judge." Great I and little you! The question of sending missionaries from China to America has been argued in our councils at home, but our best men (as they should) frowned upon it at once, and, strenuously advocating the religion of Confucius, said, "Let us mind our own business. Their religion is as sacred to them as ours to us." Those who know our history know that we have never interfered with the religion of other nations. I will leave the answer to Americans themselves, if those of my people who have embraced Christianity are not the most sycophantic, fawning, and contemptible of all our people, despised by their own countrymen, outcasts from the land of their birth, and closely watched and snubbed by Americans. Our own religion teaches us that it is not only wrong to steal and lie, but that punishment is certain and sure. The Christian religion teaches that punishment is not sure, as, if you can evade human laws, God will forgive you if you only ask it. Consequently, all the Christian Chinese, without exception, will lie and steal, if money can be made by it; and they will tell you so, too.

Christians often abuse their own families, even to the abandonment of father and mother. Such a thing is unknown in China. No matter how degraded a man may be, he never forgets his duty to the aged and helpless. Public sentiment in China would punish him severely should he neglect that duty. Compare the morals of this Christian land with ours? They dare not publicly do it. Justice, which Christians talk so much about, is nowhere so impartially administered as in what you are pleased to call heathen countries, and punishment cannot there be evaded. No cases of crime are put off or laid over in China, that the criminal may escape. No prisons hold lives of wretchedness from which there is no appeal; no packed juries can ever shelter crime there. The evidence is demanded and heard on both sides, and a just judgment rendered and immediately executed. Your bolts and bars, your locksmiths, your iron safes—made larger and stronger each year—are all speaking commentaries on your boasted Christian teachings. Count the criminals in your prisons. Forty-nine in every fifty are professing Christians! and they admit it, too. We, as a nation, do not believe the Christian religion has any foundation whatever, except as it is based upon the writings of Confucius, who, it is well known, lived and wrote five hundred years before the New Testament was known. Many of our wise rules for the government of mankind now found in your Testament were remodelled from our ancient books. Bear with me whilst I give the very words from Confucius: "Do unto another as thou wouldst be dealt with thyself. Thou only needst this law alone; it is the foundation and principal of all the rest."

"The wise man has no sooner fixed his eyes on a good man but he endeavors to imitate his virtue; but the same wise man has no sooner fixed his eyes on a man given up to his vices but, mistrusting himself, he interrogates himself in a trembling manner if he be not like that man."

"It is not enough to know virtue, it is necessary to love it; but it is not sufficient to love it, it is necessary to possess it."

"Acknowledge thy benefits by the return of other benefits, but never revenge injuries."

"Heaven shortens not the life of man; it is man that does it by his own crimes."

"Let frugality, temperance, modesty, and prudent economy become the objects of your reflection, and regulate your conduct."

"Let the public schools be carefully maintained, and, above all, let youth be instructed early in the duties of life, and formed to good morals."

Let those who would make light of our religion and morals ponder well upon the above, and remember where they obtained the best of theirs. Who should know so well as the Jews about the origin of the Christian religion? Let them testify who lived at the time and on the spot where all those wonderful things are said to have occurred. They deny that there is any truth in the miracles recorded, and treat the whole subject with derision. I will only say to the Christians, Keep your people (as pretended teachers) out of our country, do not meddle with our dearest and most cherished ideas, and our people will thank you. But I have said sufficient for the present. SAA KEE, English Teacher. —San Francisco Chronicle, Jan. 15.

ATHEISTS IN COURT.

In the trial of Mrs. Woodhull some months ago a witness against her was excluded on the ground of his disbelief in a personal God. It is understood that Mr. James Parton, the historian, and Mr. Charles Moran, ex-President of the Erie Railway, and Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, and other well-known gentlemen, have subscribed a sum of money sufficient to test the legality and constitutionality of Judge McAdam's decision in the courts. It is the question whether civil rights are suspended on beliefs of any sort. Is a man obliged to hold any opinion on any subject in order to have his testimony taken in a court, or to get justice done him in any cause? The question is a simple one, but of fundamental importance, and without advocating either side we simply call attention to the issue it involves.

Of course a great deal may be said as to the necessity of surrounding the administration of justice with such restrictions and defences as shall make it the citadel of truth and fairness. But it is an open question what those defences and restrictions shall be. Once the unbeliever in a personal Deity was regarded as an atheist, and held as the enemy of order and mankind and truth. He was very likely to be an immoral and bad man, and there was a show of reason for not accepting the testimony of a man who could not take an oath because he acknowledged no Being to whom he was bound in moral obligation. But the progress of society has been through minute differentiations, and the rule adopted to exclude the denying and blaspheming atheist of the Middle Ages now cuts off the most advanced thinkers of the world—men who believe in a Supreme Intelligence and Power of some sort, but cannot attribute personality to him or it. They are anything but atheists, yet the Unknown Power they call God, when they use that term at all, does not correspond to the old or generally received idea of personality. The rule, as laid down by Judge McAdam, and by many of our Roman Catholic police justices, would exclude such men as Spinoza, regarded by many as the greatest mind of the last century, and Alexander Humboldt and John Stuart Mill, regarded by many as the two greatest intellects of the present century. It would cut off Tyndall, and Huxley, and Grote, and Morley, Maudsley, and Herbert Spencer, and Professor John Fiske, and Dr. John W. Draper, and indeed a large body of advanced scientists of Europe and America. Many of the clergymen of this country and England are pantheists, and could not testify under this ruling. It is a question whether the American people will consent to a decision which will admit the testimony of any ignorant wretch who will hold up his hand and kiss the Bible, and yet exclude men like Francis W. Newman, of England, and Ralph Waldo Emerson, of this country, as incompetent and untrustworthy. It is a question of opinions versus civil rights, and as such is of the utmost interest to all men, especially to all Americans. Besides this, the provision of the law in apparent accordance with which the testimony of atheists is excluded in courts of justice was really intended to admit it, since it guarantees that no person shall be held incompetent to testify because of his religious belief. By a strange perversion of meaning, this has been held to assert the necessity of some religious belief in the mind of him who may testify.—New York Graphic, February 2.

LETTER FROM MEXICO.

CITY OF MEXICO, Dec. 29, 1874.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRANSCRIPT:—

In Catholic countries the celebration of Christmas takes a different form from that which it presents in Protestant lands. The preëminent importance of her by whose instrumentality the great scheme announced by prophecy was carried into effect influences the ceremonies by which this ancient church celebrates so important an event. For, while the Protestants consider the birth of the Divine Child as the central point of interest, and commence their Christmas at the Nativity, the Catholics begin a week or two previously, and the festival closes when the Protestants begin. It is the Virgin who is the principal figure in the Catholic celebration. In Mexico, for example, at the approach of the 25th of December, the talk is of and each family is expected to "give" a set of them, or each member of the family may "give" one as its patron. And, again, it seems proper to explain what may be a mystery to our young and innocent readers, and show how this celebration is conducted. Not only the professed Catholics here have these posadas, but the young people of American or English families will most likely take part as heartily as the Catholics would in our Christmas eve plays. We asked a bright boy of Protestant antecedents, who invited us to the posada he was to give in his Protestant family, "What do you do?" "Oh, we pray [to the Virgin Mary], and we sing [also to the Virgin], and go in procession with the 'holy pilgrims' [the Virgin and St. Joseph], and the angel and the donkey [on which the Virgin rode to Bethlehem], and we let off rockets, and eat sweetmeats, and we dance."

This is the general programme of this solemn ceremony. The word posada means an inn, or place of shelter for travellers, or the shelter there given. The ceremony represents the painful journey to Bethlehem, where Jesus was to be born. A party of singers carry on a board the figures, plain or elegant as means will allow, of the Virgin and her spouse St. Joseph; also an angel and an ass, and perhaps some lambs, and a shed for their final accommodation. This party sings verses which represent the need of shelter for the night, and at a door of the supposed inn or house they ask for hospitality. But inside is another choir which denies this accommodation. The travellers insist, and represent their condition and urgent needs, specifying, indeed, with great clearness, the merits of the case. Although at first the people inside declare that the Holy Family were open to suspicion, and as likely as not might be robbers, yet at last they understand how things are, and gladly receive the blessed pilgrims. According to the religious state of the people, there is more or less of prayers and litanies recited and sung; now it seems that this part is greatly curtailed, but it is made up by the refreshments—at the cost of the "giver," or patron of the posada,—the fireworks, and especially by the ball, where are social and intimate relations between the swains and young ladies, who, during the rest of the year perhaps, have been separated from them by the height of lofty balconies, or cold, iron window-gratings. So the Christmas everywhere is celebrated according to the various ideas of the celebrants, and the posadas in some form are likely to keep their place.

A LIBERAL CATHOLIC SCHOOL.

Being present at the examination of the classes in "Religion" in a "Roman Catholic" college, we were entertained by the lively manner in which the worthy and wide-awake priest—one of the most distinguished in this capital—spoke of the United States. In order to bring out the knowledge of the girls he pretended to dispute indisputable doctrines, giving the pupils an opportunity of defending them. It ought to be well known to our readers, and doubtless is, that there are three forms of worship, the third being public worship. During this part of the examination it comes out that "Mexico has no public worship (its government and rulers being completely irreligious), while in the United States, at the simple recommendation of President Grant, the whole nation recognizes the Supreme Being and renders thanks to him; the American Thanksgiving being an act of public worship." The expulsion of the Sisters of Charity just now, and the pressure of this "ungodly" government, is evidently causing a feeling of respect and admiration for the toleration and general religious spirit in the North. From positive declarations and clear inferences it was evident, in this examination, that the Catholic director of the class of "Religion" had great respect for the Christians who were not counted in his own fold, and that there might be salvation outside of his own peculiar church. And in his examination of ancient history and of the Phœnicians, he paid high praise to the Americans, who showed the energy of that vigorous people.

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY EXPELLED FROM MEXICO.

This society has been finally suppressed, and virtually banished. They might stay as individuals if they would abandon their distinctive dress, their living "and community," and giving up what they cannot possibly give up. So three hundred of them are preparing to leave. The government allows them a month to get away, permitting them to use their white bonnets, etc., meanwhile. The general feeling of the Mexicans and foreigners, of Protestants as well as Catholics, is regret at this measure, which gives an opportunity to blame the government. One authority cites, as proof of their weakness, that they were "afraid of three hundred old women." By the law, however, by which the other convents were suppressed, these are equally included. If they should pass to the United States they will doubtless be well received, and can live together and wear the clothes they choose. H. W. P.

A CRUCIAL TEST.

In spite of alleged exposures, Mrs. Hardy continues her weekly materializing séances at her residence in Concord Square, beside giving frequent exhibitions in other parts of the country. At her last séance in this city several Boston journalists were present, including Mr. Abbot, of THE INDEX, who did not hesitate to declare the phenomena quite inexplicable. Mr. Abbot, by the by, was of the party lately entertained by the amateur medium described in the Globe as having excelled Mrs. Hardy in her own specialty and by a trick of legerdemain. By Mr. Abbot's account, however, it appears that the amateur medium had a confederate, and did not submit to the investigation courted by Mrs. Hardy, who at her last Friday night séance submitted to what might be called the crucial test of allowing Mr. Abbot and another journalist to go into the very laboratory from whence the spirit hands were projected, and that, too, during the exhibition. Both gentlemen satisfied themselves that no machinery or devices for simulating the phenomena were beneath the table, but the first explorer had scarcely emerged from the dark space before a hand was seen to thrust itself through the aperture in the table. The same exhibition succeeded the investigation by Mr. Abbot, but after a somewhat longer interval of time.

Some of the hands shown were very remarkable for their perfect resemblance to the form and movements of the mortal member, and one of them, agreeably to an expressed wish, pointed upward with its index finger, showing the flexibility and voluntary motion of its mates.—Boston Herald, Feb. 13.

THOSE SPIRIT HANDS.

The controversy about those "spirit hands" goes on without much prospect of a satisfactory conclusion; but nobody will like to be set down as a convert to the belief in their genuineness until he has been actually persuaded by proofs conclusive to his own mind. A paragraph in the Evening Herald of Saturday is calculated to give the impression that Mr. Abbot, of THE INDEX, who was present at the last séance at Mrs. Hardy's, was convinced that there was no fraud or deception in the exhibition. We are assured by Mr. Abbot himself that nothing could be further from the truth than such an impression, though he admits that he discovered nothing. He says that, so far as he is able to reach any conclusion now, the cause of the phenomena is unintelligible to him, but he is by no means convinced that it is spirits. He was not satisfied that no "machinery or devices" were used in producing these phenomena, though he found no indication of any in the enclosure under the table. Like almost everybody else, he is unable to account for the appearance of those hands, but he is not therefore convinced that they are produced by spirits, or that they are not produced by some device of jugglery. There is another misstatement in the Herald paragraph, which is of little consequence, but as some people are sensitive on this subject we wish to be fairly understood. We did not state that the exhibition of the "amateur medium" excelled Mrs. Hardy's, except in the matter of distinctness and light. It was far from being so inexplicable. A respectful distance was necessary to the completeness of the illusion, and a critical examination after the performance began would have been fatal to its success. We have, as yet, heard of no one who has discovered any trick or mode of deception in Mrs. Hardy's exhibition of visible hands, and if it is a trick it is yet to be discovered and exposed. If it is not, all that we desire is to have that clearly proved by the exclusion of every chance for deception, and the application of tests that shall be absolutely conclusive. It is a matter which, if what it claims to be, is of transcendent interest and importance; and if an imposture, it is one of the most atrocious on record. All we want is the truth, and we assume nothing without evidence.—Boston Globe, Feb. 15.

ROBINSON CRUSOE'S ISLAND.—Prof. Agassiz gives an interesting account of the appearance of the very famous island called Juan Fernandez at the present time, which will entertain our Crusoe readers. It is inhabited by some twelve persons, including children. They have good poultry and vegetables, splendid beef, and can get goats by climbing after them, for the wild goats are still numerous there, and flocks of hundreds of them may be seen upon the mountains. The island is ten or twelve miles long, and four wide; the shore mostly precipitous, and the mountain ridges three thousand feet high. The water around the island is deep, and the appearance is as if there had once been an extensive island, with a splendid rugged chain upon it; that suddenly the bottom had been knocked from under all except this patch of ten miles by four, and all but this had sunk into the sea. Valleys and mountains, spurs and gentle slopes, are all cut off by this precipitous edge, and there are but few places on the island where a landing can be effected.

THERE is a foolish corner even in the brain of a sage.—Selected.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

GOOD CHEER.

BY S. H. MORSE.

Hurrah!

Yet stay your hands from forcing rights,—
That cause shall fail ignobly fights.
Great truths ascend to hold the throne,
As all souls make those truths their own.

Hurrah!

For words of Truth with spirit free
Have wings will waft them o'er the sea:
Where mortals dwell they'll make their way,
And cheerily sing the glad new day!

I THANK THEE, GOD, THAT I CAN DIE.

BY WILLIAM BRUNTON.

I thank thee, God, that I can die;
That soul and body part at last;
That I, uncaged, like bird shall fly,
Till all of earth and time is past.
I thank thee fully, freely, strong,
For very joy I almost cry,
I thank thee, God, with joyous song,
I thank thee, God, that I can die!

I thank thee, God, that I can die;
My heart rejoices Death is made—
That Death will not in slight pass by Till I within the grave am laid.
I have no fears of this "last sleep,"
No doubts, no griefs, no askings why;
My soul adores thy wisdom deep,
I thank thee, God, that I can die.

I love the life thy wisdom sent,
The sphere in which I move to-day;
I have no scorn, no discontent,
Yet would not here forever stay.
I pray for other scenes, above;
For other realms I earnest try;
And thus I own thy liberal love,
And thank thee, God, that I can die.

I must resign this present lot,
Or let me weep or bless thy name;
Death comes to all, or pleased or not,
And has on all an equal claim.
And I would fain thy love allow,
And meet thy will without a sigh;
And so I love the living now,
And thank thee, God, that I can die.

Oh, when I leave this mortal form,
And wend my way to higher life,
How shall I bless these days of storm,
This scene of struggle, care, and strife;
And how shall I rejoice to see
The blessed reach of opening sky!
To be so blest, to be so free!
I thank thee, God, that I can die.

I die—yet live,—and live with thee!
I live to grow in health and grace,
I live that I may perfect be,
And serve before thy friendly face.
Oh, Death is dear, and bright, and glad,
'Tis Life in infinite supply:
The highest gift thy goodness had—
I thank thee, God, that I can die!

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on Boston or New York. Checks on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

The Index.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 18, 1875.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 1, TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

W. NEWMAN (England), GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE
(England), Editorial Contributors.

GREAT EFFORTS are making by the Catholics to acquire control of the colored people of the South. The Right Reverend Bishop Vaughan, of England, Superior-general of St. Joseph's Mission of the Sacred Heart, and six priests, have lately arrived here on this business. The chief houses of this mission are at Baltimore and Louisville, and another will be established soon at Charleston or some other Southern city.

MR. H. L. GREEN, of Syracuse, N. Y., who is very successful canvassing for THE INDEX in the West, is cordially commended to the hospitality and good offices of its friends wherever he may go. He has lately been securing new subscribers at the rate of ten a day, and shows what zeal and enterprise in the good cause can accomplish. Will not others take encouragement from his success, and give the paper a little cordial help just now in the very necessary work of increasing its circulation? All we want is a simultaneous advance "all along the line."

PINK SLIPS with this printed inscription—"Dear Sir, This specimen copy of THE INDEX is mailed to your address at the suggestion of a friend, with the hope that you will be sufficiently interested to subscribe for the paper. Please examine it, and, if in sympathy with its general tenor, favor us with your subscription. Respectfully yours, The Index Association,"—are affixed to specimen copies of THE INDEX, and mailed to all the addresses of possible subscribers which are furnished to the paper by its friends. Please send in your lists of names, and thus aid in extending the circulation of the "wickedest paper"!

A BOUND volume of THE INDEX either for 1871 or 1872, as desired, will be sent as a premium by express to any one who will remit the names of two new subscribers, with their addresses in full and the six dollars in advance. These volumes labor under the serious disadvantage of containing more essays by the editor than either of the subsequent ones, as his "barrel" was not then exhausted; but the contributed and selected articles of permanent interest are good enough to atone for his prosy pen, and render the books very valuable premiums. This offer cannot be continued long, as the supply of the volumes is limited to a small number; but it is thought best to give the old friends of the paper this chance of helping themselves and it at the same time.

A MR. ANTHONY, according to a correspondent of the Investigator, has introduced into the Missouri Legislature a school bill which is moulded in the interest of the Roman Catholic Church, and which, if passed, will accomplish a division of the school money among individual parents. It consolidates the school fund, and places it under the control of the Governor and the County Treasurers; it provides that—"Parents, guardians, and other persons who have care of children, can send them to any school in the State and draw the full amount of money due each child; and such books can be selected as each one may desire. No act shall be construed so as to force a mixture of races, etc." By this bill the public school money will be paid out to any one who can establish a claim to the care of a child, and thus placed under the control of the Catholic priests in a large number of instances; and the destruction of the whole school system would soon be the result. The intelligent friends of education must be vigilant and united, or the era of "ignorance and devotion" will return once more before long.

"CHRISTIANITY NOTWITHSTANDING."

Rev. Minot J. Savage, who, while still an Orthodox clergyman, published two or three years ago a book that attained a wide circulation under the title of Christianity the Science of Manhood, and who is now the pastor of Rev. George H. Hepworth's former society in this city, delivered an address on January 14 before a Unitarian Conference, which will be found republished in this week's INDEX as the opening essay. We have read it with great admiration of the general tone and spirit it manifests, so intrepid, truth-loving, and direct; it kindles a hope that the Unitarians will be incited by this example of a new recruit from Orthodoxy to grapple vigorously with the great issues they have until lately met by a seeming "conspiracy of silence." Mr. Savage intends, at least, to grapple with these issues; and, if he fails to do so fully, it is evident enough that the sole reason is his present unfamiliarity with the grounds of the convictions he opposes. This sermon is proof of courage, ability, and great moral earnestness. When he comes to appreciate at its full strength the position he now controverts because he as yet only partially apprehends it, we shall be greatly mistaken if he does not put his thought into action once more; and we venture to predict that, before many years have elapsed, he will find himself in unendurable want of harmony with the collective action and general drift of the denomination he has so lately joined, however delightful its private fellowship may be and is.

Without attempting to follow all its argument, we wish to say something respecting some of the leading points of this discourse.

Mr. Savage begins by affirming the right of free thought in the most absolute way—concedes "all the liberty that is claimed by the Free Religious platform"—declares that he "sees nothing to be gained by Unitarianism's allowing Free Religion to take from her the glorious prestige of utter freedom"—and uses language of thrilling manliness on this point. He then affirms that "the Free Religious platform seems to me to contain nothing whatever inconsistent with Christianity," and believes that this platform is "misrepresented" by THE INDEX.

Now this is a matter which can be subjected to the test of observation and experiment. The constitution of the Free Religious Association, which is the only "platform" ever adopted by them or accepted as in any way expressing their collective position, affirms "that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every human being." When has any such freedom as that even been verbally affirmed by any Unitarian body? If any explicit affirmation of the unqualified right of free thought and free speech has ever been made by any Unitarian organization, we have yet to learn the fact, and must wait till it is proved before conceding that Unitarianism has ever gone so far as even to profess the fundamental principle of Free Religion, which is absolute religious freedom in unlimited religious fellowship. We must respectfully decline to accept as evidence the words of any individual Unitarian, and must insist that the words of Unitarian organizations are the only evidence that is admissible on this subject; for every individual assertion of Unitarian freedom can be more than matched with equally strong individual assertions of Unitarian submission to the "authority of the Lord Jesus Christ." These balance and neutralize each other as evidence; the only proof that will prove anything must be collective, not individual, affirmations.

If from words we turn to acts, we find that the Free Religious Association has actually had on their platform persons representing all phases of belief—Christians, extra-Christians, anti-Christians, Jews and "infidels," theists and atheists, materialists and spiritualists, orthodox and heterodox of almost all degrees of orthodoxy and heterodoxy; and persons of all these opinions are or may be, by simple subscription, enrolled on the list of membership without any inquiry as to their belief. Can any Unitarian organization say as much? Is their fellowship practically thrown open to persons of all types of religious thought? If so, we shall be very glad to learn a fact of which we are now in total ignorance.

But, more than this, the Free Religious Association can say truthfully that they set up not even a name as a limit to thought or a test of fellowship. They do not require any one to profess himself a "Free Religionist," or to call himself a believer in "religion" of any sort; on the contrary, some of the members of the Association reject the word "religion" as synonymous with superstition, yet no one dreams of questioning their right to full membership with all its privileges. No name whatever is a shibboleth in that Association. Can any Unitarian organization say as much? Did not a Unitarian society, within eight years, apply for and obtain from the Supreme Court of New Hampshire an injunction prohibiting forever the minister of a certain Independent society, or any one holding his views, to utter them in their church-building—an application secretly favored and backed by the then officers of the American Unitarian Association, and approved by a Unitarian judge on the bench of the Supreme Court itself? Have not the present officers of the same Association recently stricken from the official list of Unitarian clergymen the name of one of their most prominent and most highly respected ministers, for the avowed reason that he declined to call himself explicitly by the Unitarian Christian name? And was not this act approved by the American Unitarian Association at their last annual meeting? And was it not again approved by the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches? Has any protest against these glaring violations of the rights of spiritual freedom and spiritual fellowship ever been uttered by a single Unitarian organization? We point now to facts—not to frothy declamations unbacked by deeds. Will Mr. Savage look these facts squarely in the face, and still claim that Unitarianism has all the liberty of Free Religion?

Thus far we have appealed to observation—to facts which are patent to all who will look at them. But a short and easy experiment will settle the matter beyond a doubt. Let Mr. Savage, or any other minister of his denomination, explicitly say in public that he is neither a Christian nor a Unitarian; and not only will his name be struck out of the next Year Book, but he will be driven from his pulpit without any great delay. This is a rash prediction of ours on which we unhesitatingly stake whatever reputation we may enjoy as a divinely inspired prophet! Perhaps a Unitarian society may here and there retain an already settled minister even under these circumstances, by reason of long or close personal attachment; but such anomalies will soon disappear, the minister finding no new society, and the old one either retreating to Unitarianism or advancing to independence. Experiment will not fail, we think, if faithfully tried, to prove the same conclusions to which the facts already cited clearly point.

Mr. Savage cannot name an opinion whose open avowal or public advocacy would affect in the slightest degree the rights of any member of the Free Religious Association. But we venture to say that no minister will be long tolerated in Unitarian pulpits who publicly denies that Jesus is the Christ in any sense; or who publicly denies the existence of a personal God; or who publicly denies the doctrine of a future life after death. When Mr. Savage, therefore, says that the Free Religious platform contains "nothing whatever inconsistent with Christianity," we are constrained to reply that it contains at least one thing which is inconsistent with the Christianity professed by his own denomination,—namely, "absolute liberty of thought and expression."

One other point only will we notice here. Mr. Savage says: "It is a noteworthy fact that, when Mr. Abbot wishes to take his anti-Christian position, he leaves his old platform of Liberal Christianity, and frames a new definition to meet the exigencies of his warfare." No! Discovering by personal experience, as well as by observation and study, that there is no such thing as "Liberal" Christianity, and loving Christianity less than liberty, we found the definition which Christianity has written out for itself on the page of history and on the living Christian institutions of to-day. We have "framed no new definition" of it at all; we deny the right in reason of any man to "frame a new definition" of it, except as a consequence of getting new light on the thing itself. The collective utterances of the Christian Church, the venerable formularies and creeds gradually built up in obedience to the inherent laws of the Christian organism, give the only definition of Christianity which the scientific student of history will ever accept. To these creeds we add only the perception that their net influence on the course of human progress has been crippling, retarding, and hostile; and there you have all the elements of our "new definition." It is not we, but Unitarianism, telling the vast Christian Church that it does not understand its own religion and benevolently undertaking to "teach its grandmother how to suck eggs," that is guilty of innovation in this matter. If it does not like our definition, its quarrel is not with us, but with Christendom. Is it not about time to cease exclaiming at our audacity in pressing a "new definition" of our own, when we have only picked up one as old as the Christian era? Really, the criticism pays an undeserved compliment to our originality; and we waive it in honor of the Neo-Christianity which has discovered a strikingly novel view of the universe by standing on its own head. It is Unitarianism alone which attempts to "force its private dictionary into public circulation"; and we would invite Mr. Savage to step outside the little circle of his newly adopted denomination, in order to see what "dictionary" is in actual use in the great world he has for a while forgotten. He will then find that he might as well talk Choctaw as persist in using the bizarre technology of the Neo-Christian school.

KNOWLEDGE AND WISDOM.

This is the knowing age. We have had other ages of art, philosophy, and literature; but this is distinctively the age of science. The scientific spirit is in the air. It is quickening our schools and all our institutions of learning. Society at large is permeated with it, and under its stimulus men are becoming inquirers and seekers, explorers and discoverers. People are hungry for facts, eager for information. They are ransacking the earth and the heavens with telescopes and microscopes, and every other instrument of invention. They are experimenting in every field of physics; they are pushing their inquiries into every department of social statistics, being infinitely busy in collecting statistics, tabulating facts, making reports, and planning reforms; they are studying into political economy, and proposing to organize and reorganize politics and governments on the basis of new theories and principles; in every conceivable way they are intent on enlarging the boundaries of their knowledge, and gathering stores of information from all possible quarters.

No fault can be found with this, surely. We cannot know too much. We cannot be too well informed as to the contents of the world we live in, the nature of beast and bird and man, the history of the earth and all its races, the unfolding of the heavens with their infinitude of stars, the foundation and structure of human society, the mysteries of matter and the problems of mind. The universe is before us, awaiting our investigation, and inviting us to its acquaintance. We have no power in it or over it except as knowledge arms and equips us with that efficiency. We are slaves to ignorance and fear and superstition until knowledge breaks our bonds and sets us free. To know is, then, in order. The spirit of curiosity, of inquiry and investigation, we are fortunate to have inherited from all the past; and we do well to cultivate and make the most of it.

But is there any difference between knowledge and wisdom? Is it possible for one to be quite knowing, and yet not really wise? The system of education in vogue at the present time does seem to give occasion for the suspicion that this may be true. Knowledge, in the popular and ordinary scientific sense of the word, implies mainly the exercise and development of our purely intellectual faculties; but wisdom implies the exercise and development of all our faculties, intellectual, spiritual, and moral. Knowledge appears to imply the intelligent apprehension of things and the truth about things; whereas wisdom implies this and more,—namely, the perception of the relations between things and the truths of things. Knowledge makes men acquainted with and fit for some sphere or vocation in life; but wisdom makes them to understand and be fit for life itself, and interested in the whole of life's meaning and outcome. Knowledge, even much knowledge, often leaves a man narrow, dogmatic, conceited, and bigoted; but wisdom, even a little wisdom, makes him broad, liberal, modest, and humanitarian. With knowledge come cunning, skill, and efficiency; with wisdom come light, life, and inspiration. Wisdom is knowledge well digested, and diffused throughout the whole being, and rightly related and applied to all the subjects and objects of experience.

Now, our schools and colleges for the most part teach knowledge, but not wisdom; they make our children and youth very knowing, but not very wise. Often the playground teaches the boy more wisdom than the schoolroom, and the collegian finds that life gives him a more liberal education than he obtained at the university. Our schools teach technicalities, not ideas. Ideas are not the qualification demanded of teachers, but some special and narrow training. If the teacher have ideas, the temptation if not the necessity of his or her vocation is to keep them for the club or the private circle; the routine of class lessons must not be enlivened by them; besides, the marks of rank are determined, not by the general wisdom of the scholar, but by his particular knowledge of some one or more technical studies. Thus, not inspiration but stimulation fills the air of the schoolroom, and is breathed by both teacher and scholar,—a stimulation which is unwholesome to body and mind, and deteriorating to their finest tone and quality.

A few years ago, circumstances led me to pass one whole year in the daily society of several instructors in one of the oldest and best institutions of learning in the land. I was constantly being impressed with the really narrow and illiberal education which many of these knowing men had received, with their lack of general intelligence and actual ignorance of many things which made them appear curiosities of learned foolishness, with their one-sided, formal, uninspired, and uninspiring views of life altogether. I saw plainly that these men had plenty of knowledge of certain kinds, but little or no wisdom; that instead of being instructors they ought to be instructed; that the education which they were imparting to young men was in no sense a broad, liberal, and rational one; and that the world had little to hope from these unwise wise ones, except that they would contrive to live and die without causing it too much trouble.

Far too much of the so-called culture of our modern times is knowledge without wisdom, intellect without soul, mental understanding without spiritual discernment. It is characterized by a striking deficiency of good judgment and good sense, and the capacity of perceiving the interior significance of things. People go on learning things, but remain ignorant all the while of the soul of things; they add this, that, and the other accomplishment to their catalogue of knowledges, and yet they persevere to be men and women without ideas, and without value as choice friends and companions. A distinguished man of letters, himself an important contributor to the very finest literature of this generation, remarked to me not long since that he found the common run of literary society in this country to be very dry and uninteresting; "beyond the ordinary chit-chat of their profession, speak to these people of ideas," he said, "and they stare at you with the most amiable imbecility!" But why should this be so, if literature means anything more than a popular grammatical arrangement of words? It ought to be the vehicle of grand and inspiring ideas—ideas which should enlighten the intellect, and set the heart and soul on fire. Yet we never shall have such a literature in this country, until our education and culture impart to the children and youth wisdom as well as knowledge.

"With all thy getting get understanding," says the proverb,—the understanding of the heart as well as of the head, of the spirit as well as of the intellect. No one word can express the whole, not even that broad one of science. To know is not enough; we must hope, imagine, believe, love, aspire, and worship. The most adorable trinity is composed of the True, the Good, the Beautiful. Knowledge is not enough to recognize all these; but wisdom leads us to bow before the wonderful Three! A. W. S.

THE NATIONAL BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

"A Statement of the Theory of Education in the United States of America, as approved by many Leading Educators."

"The National Bureau of Education: its History, Work, and Limitations."

I should like to call the attention of readers of THE INDEX to these last two circulars of the National Bureau, as, although very brief and simple, they may serve to correct many erroneous notions. Our people have such a jealous dread of centralized authority that many of them imagine the establishment of this bureau to be a step towards arbitrary power; but this circular shows it to be simply a convenient agency for collecting and diffusing information in regard to our public schools, and matters of interest connected with them.

We all desire to see constant and great improvement in our public school system; but we are a little likely to forget that the first indispensable condition for introducing reforms judiciously is a thorough knowledge of these institutions as they actually exist. Many critics of the public schools speak as if the methods of fifty years ago were the ones now generally used, and will strenuously advocate the introduction of measures as wholly new which have been in use for years. Others propose Utopian plans which could be carried out with unlimited pecuniary means, without considering that economy of the public resources is one of the constant limitations of the legislator. When Goldsmith was in need of employment, some of his friends proposed to send him to China to bring home new inventions in the mechanic arts. "He!" said Dr. Johnson,—"he would bring home a wheelbarrow and think it a new invention." Many of our enthusiastic advocates for improvement in the schools resemble the delightful writer in this respect, and, if they would spend as many hours in examining the public schools as they do in talking about them, would find a great deal to cheer and encourage their hearts, as well as plenty of opportunity to suggest really necessary improvements.

Every person can do a great deal also in aiding the National Bureau in its work, by sending for its publications and spreading them abroad, and by carefully furnishing in return such local information as is desired.

The plain statement of the public school system may seem dry and meagre; but, when it is remembered that it was necessary to confine it to such views as would meet the approbation of all,—and that, as the schools are State and not national institutions, they vary very greatly in different localities,—it will be seen that a fuller statement would be impossible. This one does give the plain, fundamental principles in which all agree, although perhaps all could not have stated them in the metaphysical terms which are here employed. The one most important condition for the improvement of our schools is the thorough acquaintance of the whole people with them, and the Bureau is doing much to make this possible. E. D. C.

CHURCH AND NAVY.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, so the newspaper informs us, has prepared a form of service to be used at the launching of any vessel belonging to the British Navy. The service begins with Psalm one hundred and seven, at the twenty-third verse: "They that go down to the sea in ships." Will he allude to the kind of "business" they purpose doing in the great waters? There might be a propriety in a religious service associating the Church with the merchant marine, for that is an agent of civilization. The merchant-ship suggests intercourse among nations, peace, friendly relations, the cessation of war, and the destruction of its causes. The navy suggests war, mutual hostility, jealousy, national pride, insolence, and vindictiveness. But the navy represents government, the State; and the alliance between State and Church demands these little courtesies. The Church leaves bales of goods unattended to, and reserves its blessing for banners. It prays for victory on national arms, not for the triumph of peaceful enterprise. This is natural. The Church cannot afford to be on ill terms with its friend; and, as its friend holds both army and navy precious as the apple of his eye, it would be ungracious not to implore on them the special favor of heaven. Had the Church maintained its dignity apart from the State, it would never have been caught in such absurd and inhuman practices.

Mr. Lecky (European Morals, II., 269) makes the terrible assertion: "We may look in vain for any period since Constantine in which the clergy, as a body, exerted themselves to repress the military spirit, or to abridge or prevent a particular war, with an energy or a success the least comparable to what they displayed during several centuries in stimulating the fanaticism of the crusaders, in producing the atrocious massacre of the Albigenses, in embittering the religious wars that followed the Reformation." And on the next page: "The broad fact remains that, with the exception of Mohammedanism, no other religion has done so much to produce war as was done by the religious teachers of Christendom during several centuries." Lecky justly ascribes this to the military fanaticism evoked by the indulgences of the popes, and to the extreme antipathy towards unorthodox opinions on theology. But something of the ferocity must be imputed to the very early and close association between religion and the government. Worldly policy had much to do with the fanaticism of the crusades, which were a business of princes as much as of priests—of princes and priests combined. The persecution of the Albigenses was not due to theological aversions alone; and the frightful religious wars that followed the Reformation must be charged to the account of the intimate alliances between spiritual and temporal powers. The sudden rise of peace doctrines in the last century accompanied the protest of the Quakers, a religious body that laid stress on the absolute separation between Church and State, as earlier it had marked the outbreak of the Anabaptists. The dissolution of that direful union certainly would not put a stop to war or its preparations; but it would deprive war and all its appurtenances of the sanction of religion, and would throw all the moral influences there might be on the side of humanity.

The fanatical performance of the English Archbishop reminds me of a good story which has the merit, I am assured, of being vero as well as ben trovato. An enthusiastic rationalist was arguing with a neighbor on the subject of war, and advocating extreme peace principles. His neighbor, a good conservative man, said: "Oh, that is all owing to your loose opinions on religion. You are a fanatic on the subject of peace, because you are a fanatic on the subject of belief." Sometime afterwards the two men chanced to meet, and again fell into conversation on the same old topic. To the surprise of the worthy churchman, the aforetime infidel advanced views similar to his own. "How is this?" he exclaimed; "I thought you were a peace man!" "So I was once," the friend replied; "but I have been converted; I am no longer an infidel, I am a Christian." O. B. F.

EAST WISCONSIN NOTES.

MILWAUKEE, Feb. 5, 1875.

It will scarcely be understood in the East how much of an event has been a series of "Parlor Conversational Lectures," held in Milwaukee the past week. They were led by Mr. Charles Mills, whose name and fame are well known to the readers of THE INDEX, and were the first of the kind ever given in this city. The course comprised three lectures; namely, "Our Aryan Ancestors," "Oriental Thought," and "Greek Thought." Dr. Dudley, of Plymouth Church, was instrumental in securing Mr. Mills for this course, and the city owes him a vote of thanks.

As Mr. Mills is widely known, and as to speak of his attainments and his felicitous manner of imparting his views would savor of flattery, however temperately I might express myself, I will not enlarge upon these points, but will simply say with all modesty that the very marked favor with which this gentleman was received in Milwaukee, together with the fact of his fearless utterance of free thought, has prompted me to jot down these notes. The work of Mr. Mills seems to me to harmonize admirably with the work of THE INDEX, which means the religious redemption of the Christian world.

A facetious reporter, writing up the "Parlor Lectures," says they were given to "Milwaukee's society pets." The phrase may be interpreted by each reader of these notes as he likes. The fact is, that the most elegant residences in our city (and we do have these among us, notwithstanding some down-east people have never been quite able to dissociate the ideas of wigwags and Wisconsin) were thrown open, and made doubly attractive by the most cordial hospitalities shown, not only to "society's pets," but to the most radical of radicals, who were drawn thither by the promise of good things hinted in the subjects announced for the lectures. The promise was more than fulfilled. The radical had a rare, rich feast, and the "pet" an appetizing taste of what will season all his future intellectual culture.

Here (if I may be allowed to say so much) among "society's pets" there is a vast field for the cultivation of intellectual tastes. Wealth and leisure are of comparatively little value, unless adjusted to the development of high thought and intellectual progress. They are of inexpressible value when so adjusted. The advent of apostles such as Mr. Mills should be hailed with enthusiasm by all who desire social redemption. May not the parlor with its æsthetic opportunities, hitherto dedicated solely to social occasions, become the scene of rare conjunctions of intellectual conversation with social enjoyment? To the parlor belong possibilities of informal interchange of thought that are denied to more public places,—to the pulpit or the platform. Parlor clubs are no rarity in far Eastern cities. Between them and the rapidly growing cities of the far West are scores of intermediate towns where such feasts of reason are unknown, and where there is a vast congregation of the unchurched, hungry for rational food, waiting to welcome the true teacher who "can speak to their condition." In the churches of these cities are also intelligent minds, dormant under the fossilizing influence of mere forms, that need but the awakening word to be impelled to the search of the fresh, upspringing flowers of free thought, growing to-day by the common roadside, but hidden from so many eyes by old beliefs. The spirit of free inquiry is stirring the blood of thousands. The air is thick with doubts and oppressive with vague unrest. Leaders of free thought are needed. The field is ripe for a new departure in the methods of teaching the better thought. Pulpit preachers are fighting a losing battle against this omnipresent spirit of inquiry. Iconoclasts are too apt to be mere individualists. They form a one-man or a one-woman congregation, enjoy their own emancipation, and disregard those who are still in thralldom. Not many are qualified by research, attainment, and power of expression, like Mr. Mills and his co-workers, but all may have the spirit of the teacher; and this spirit should be that of the young Carpenter of Galilee, seeking not to destroy but to fulfil. Though but two or three gather together, with the spirit of free investigation in their midst, they will find it good for them to be there. I am glad to see the list of Liberal Leagues increasing.

The teacher may be timid, and feel sensibly all his short-comings, but these informal conversations will rub off the shyness. We all know how a brisk talk operates upon us to bring out a thought from a brain cell,—hidden away, forgotten perhaps, but really registered there, as our later physiologists tell us. There should be a club of some sort formed upon a free basis in every town and village in the States. In every one of them more freethinkers than would be believed can be found. Among them will be one or more capable and willing to teach, and the many will willingly be taught. There is work to be done, and Free Religion needs its missionaries, its preachers.

In Mr. Mills I have seemed to recognize the missionary spirit. He does not take old beliefs by storm, nor say as the Christian does to the Pagan, "I am the way, and the truth, and the light, and except ye follow me ye shall be damned." He is not a proselytizer, but a preserver; not an aggressor, but a constructor; not exclusive, but inclusive. The tendency of his thought, however, is to correct the Christian bias which disparages religiousness in all religions save the Christian, by suggesting that there is a sacredness in other Scriptures than our own, and that ideals of holiness vitalize them all. He culls from the centuries before Christ such rare buds of wisdom and goodness that one not before familiar with those old Scriptures is led to marvel that the rich blossoming-time of purity and devotion has been delayed so long. We almost ask, Does it remain for modern free thought to discover those great truths in the past, and bring them at this late day to their natural fulfillment?

To Mr. Dudley the Milwaukee people are also indebted for the privilege of hearing Mr. Mills speak on Sunday evening, in Plymouth Church, upon the "Aspects and Omens of the Times." This eloquent lecture was full of striking facts, and the lecturer followed them fearlessly into whatsoever field of liberal thought they might lead. In so doing, however, he emphasized, as he continually does in his parlor talks, the idea of infinite perfection, the possibilities of finite attainment to this perfection, and the permeation of the human with the Divine essence.

A pleasant surprise occurred during Mr. Mills' stay in the city. This was a visit from Mr. A. Bronson Alcott, of Concord, who took part in the conversational lectures, and also spoke in Plymouth Church parlor upon the "Ideal Church of the Future." The benignity and wisdom of this aged apostle of high thought gave a peculiar grace to his words. If walls could speak, as they are often said to hear, it might be curious to question Plymouth walls as to how they could stand such an overturning of Orthodoxy as the venerable prophet pictured. They seemed to stand the unusual applause which the shocking picture called out, and did not fall brick by brick upon the heretical heads which prompted the feet and hands to movements that not even Orthodox walls could restrain. This forbearance may be owing to the reverend doctor himself who officiates there, who has educated them to be prepared to tumble down by-and-by gracefully and gladly, and give way for the ideal church he has cultivated his congregation to appreciate.

It will be seen that the angel of progressive thought is hovering over our fair new city of the West. The pulpit preachers feel the breath of its free wings, and chafe under the chains of creeds and forms which fetter their best efforts. Their emancipation is finally certain. Every such signal of religious redemption should be greeted with joy, and hung out to encourage the workers in our cause. Every such worker needs and should receive a hearty God-speed.

In view of the pleasant incidents of the past week, the friends of THE INDEX in Milwaukee feel pretty well, and would like to shake hands with its friends in the East, inasmuch as we have been regaled with a few choice crumbs of the sort of food of which you can partake at will. AMELIA A. WILLIAMS.

THE MINNEAPOLIS LIBERAL LEAGUE.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., Feb. 2, 1875.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

The Liberal League of this city has been reorganized and taken upon itself an active existence, instead of remaining passive as during its past history. The officers now are—S. C. Gale, President; John Vander Horck, Vice-President; S. G. Rollins, Secretary; D. L. Buell, Treasurer.

Regular meetings are held each Sunday afternoon at 2.30 P. M., the programme being, first, an essay by some person designated for the task, and, secondly, general discussion of the topic by members of the League or visitors. Considerable interest is manifested, from two to three hundred being present each Sunday, and the discussions being lively and interesting. The platform is absolutely free, persons of every shade of religious opinion being invited to be present and participate in the exercises. Thus far one enthusiastic Orthodox clergyman has put in an appearance and defended the Puritan Sabbath, and, although he was listened to respectfully and criticised moderately, his example has not been followed by others.

To show you that our youthful organization has some vitality, and is not unknown to fame, I enclose a slip clipped from the editorial page of the Citizen, an Orthodox religious publication issued in this city, and edited by a Congregational clergyman named Campbell, who, besides being a professor of religion, is also a professor of quite a number of the sciences in our progressive State University. You will observe that he dwells considerably on education and diplomas, and is utterly opposed to "educated men" casting their pearls before the swine of Radical audiences, if they are to be criticised by the ungodly.

Very truly yours,

FRANK J. MEAD.

FREE THOUGHT IN MINNEAPOLIS.

Minneapolis has a "Liberal League" nearly a month old. As the word "liberal" is of their own choosing, we suspect it has, as usual, a sort of mutual-admiration-society meaning, and is employed to rebut the suspicion that its members may be almost as narrow-minded as other people. They seem to be organized on the general principle of agreeing to disagree. Instead of being an assemblage of persons holding similar views, "it is particularly desired that all shades of religious opinions should be represented." The aim is doubtless to form an assortment of "Hegelian antinomies," and thus make unity by antitheses; or, better still, to apply the old Greek principle that "the proper conception of contradiction is the soul of a philosophical method." Whether in this indiscriminate conglomeration men would be free to carry out their conscientious convictions we fail to comprehend. For instance, the Jew is particularly invited. But is the Jew to act, to do, as well as to believe, or is he to cease to be a Jew before he can be congenial? If not, it would be his conscientious, religious duty to take with him into the hall a bag of stones, and pelt his non-Jewish companions as heretics. It is altogether probable, however, that men "of all shades" are expected to leave their consciences at home.

Just what is to be done doth not yet appear. They seem to "especially desire the presence of evangelical clergymen, provided that they allow their remarks to be criticised." If the ministers were invited to come and see whether there was a possibility of their doing the members any good, it would be a different case. If even they were requested to come and apply Prof. Tyndall's prayer-test, with the understanding that a cablegram would be sent to the professor announcing the proof of his proposition, provided one of the "Liberal" should actually be converted, that would seem reasonable. But for an incoherent jumble of non-professional theologians to invite a set of men who have a thorough education and diploma in their profession to come to be criticised is slightly suggestive of Lessing's shoemaker.

But we beg pardon; we did not intend to make sport of the "Liberal League." We shall wait anxiously for the results. If we cannot have a statement of their points of agreement (for they seem to begin by contraries instead of by similars), perhaps they will be able to work out a creed by inversion—stating in order the points which they do not believe. Still it might impinge on their "liberality" to unite in disbelieving. Meanwhile, it may be well for the ministerial brotherhood to consider Burns' reference to Captain Grose, "a chiel's amang ye takin' notes;" and, while there may be a poor show for thorough, scholarly discussion in science, theology, exegesis, manuscript history, or philosophy proper among the would-be critics, "if there's a tear in a' your coats" see that your skirts are worthy of the servants of the Lord. "Let your garments always be white," and if our prodigal brethren, who are sadly composing themselves among the husks, shall see that your life is worthy of your vocation, these wanderers may yet come back to our Father's house.

SACRED MUSIC FOR CHILDREN.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Feb. 5, 1875.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Cannot some one fitted by culture and sympathy for the work be encouraged to edit for us, and have published, a book, or a series of books, of hymns or sacred songs for our children, carefully selected with reference to their entire freedom from superstition, and set to music?

There is a want in this respect that is widely and deeply felt, that can be met in a comparatively easy way, and the service that would be rendered would be inestimable.

No single influence in education can compare with that which comes through such a channel, in its power to fix permanently right principles of conduct in mind and heart at the earliest beginnings, and to give the mould of character for all after life.

All educators, whether as professional teachers or parents, realize this truth.

There is something in the gift of poesy that is most closely allied to all that is best within us, and the gift is only complete and at its best when it comes to us on the wings of melody. That we all, in our maturer years perhaps no less than in childhood, yield to the sway of the ennobling power and beauty of song, is as true in our day of scientific penetration and enlightened culture as in times past, when the bard and the skald were the only instructors and historians of the race.

Our hymns, and such as have come down to us from the remotest times and from all lands, mark the eras of progress everywhere. They are the very crystals and flowers and "express image," at its best, of the struggling growth of humanity.

The hymns that had their birth in the genius of the Protestant Reformation were the right arm of its success among the people, and will keep its memorials dear, and the eternal cause of truth which (however obscurely recognized then) gave birth to it fresh and living in our hearts, while the delusions of its theology fade from thoughtful minds, and cease to be regarded.

There are those whose aspiration is for the utmost freedom of mind, the completest escape from the bondage of so-called "standards of authority" in matters of religious faith, who have known by personal experience and the discipline of mental conflict what that bondage is, and who, having passed through the shadow of a great darkness to the light, know what the contrast is, and love the light in which they see with an undying fervor, whose whole natures respond as ardently as ever, and with a clearer intelligence growing still more clear every hour of their lives, to Luther's—

"Ein feste Berg ist unser Gott."

They find its immortal strains among the battle-hymns of the reformation now transpiring—a reformation vastly more significant for the rights of man and the sway of the authority of truth.

The sacred lyrics you are giving to the public in THE INDEX from time to time, many of them the ripened fruit of the purest spiritual experience, inspirations from the clearest fountains of thought, no less than from the holiest sources of feeling, attest the genuine and permanent character and the integrity of the intellectual and moral emancipation of which they are the gospel—their authors, the heralds and teachers sent of God.

It is the adaptation of the powerful influence which springs from this source to the period and wants of childhood, with all its peculiar susceptibilities to such impressions, that I wish to urge. Books of sacred songs are wanted for familiar use at home and in our schools, which, while they shall be for children from the tenderest years an expression of the devotion and spiritual aspiration and those pure domestic and social affections which are the birth-right of their natures, shall be free to the utmost from any taint of darkening creed or dogma, leaving the growing mind to the natural inquiries of its maturing faculties, and the advantages and aids of culture that must then be watchfully supplied. Who is there of us that can fully estimate the value, the controlling power, of such an influence? The cause we have at heart, the cause of freedom in religious faith, of the paramount authority of conscience, of reverence for individual character and all else that this emancipation implies, is clearly enough the characteristic of the immediate future dawning for us now. And we need only reflect that within less than twenty years the youngest of the children we are now educating will be upon the stage of active life to realize the importance of the question whether we are doing all we can, intelligently making use of the best and all the means of education and good culture at our command, to enable them without hindrance, and with every advantage from the start, and with full measure of enjoyment all along, to take their part and do their best service, when they come forward. It is the purpose of these remarks to call to mind the fact that among these means and resources the special influence here referred to is well deserving of practical attention.

Its neglect is the omission of a natural resource for education, the loss of which will not and cannot be otherwise made good. There are those to whom, as well as those for whom, the editing of such books would be indeed a labor of love. The suggestion has no doubt frequently occurred to many among those who are competent in every way to do what is so much to be desired. They will have no cause to regret in any respect the result, if they will undertake it. It requires but a cursory examination of the publications in this department now before the public to satisfy any intelligent mind that the want in this particular is far from being supplied, and we shall be heartily gratified if these remarks shall be instrumental in affording any encouragement to such an enterprise.

W. K. R.

[We say amen to this article with all our heart. Would that the need here so well depicted might be supplied by some one who is really competent to the task!—Ed.]

THE ST. LAWRENCE IN WINTER.

A walk across the St. Lawrence in winter, if the day be not too cold, is a delightful recreation.

One bright sunny day recently we crossed with a friend to the village of St. Lambert's, opposite Montreal, and an account of our journey may interest distant readers of THE INDEX.

The inclined planes connecting the wharves with the city afford the school-children rare coasting; and, walking down one at our peril from the youngsters, we come to the rinks cleared on the ice for skaters by industrious stevedores, who sometimes have difficulties with naughty, dodging boys who want skating without paying. As the proprietors with their slippery boats go after these bad boys on their quick irons, the sympathy of spectators may not always be on the side of justice.

The roads leading to the city are marked at the sides by little branches of evergreen, whose considerable firmness shows pretty nearly, by spring, the prevailing direction of the winds. We find the ice-saws busy as we go, and note how friction helps the work by melting the ice; it is loaded on sleighs in beautiful clear blocks, commonly sixteen inches thick, and the driver moves off seated on his transparent throne, with a straw-bag between.

The open water left by the sawyers in moderate weather gives off vapor, which floats away in clouds, retaining their forms sometimes for miles.

The channel of the river narrows very much just below the city, and the ice made by the first cold weather breaks up with the current and is upheaved in many fantastic forms when all has become solid from shore to shore.

Now clothed by the snow, and again denuded by the wind, these slabs might be thought to mark the tombs of Arctic explorers, dead,—and dead a good while.

We pass St. Helen's Island, whose dense woods bear a new foliage now, and notice a number of workmen engaged in filling up "cahots." These cahots are the bane of the teamster, who dreads them more than the north wind; they are depressions in the road made by drifting gusts and aggravated by every sleigh that passes. So the workmen are filling them up with snow, and water from a well made by cutting a hole in the ice; and the road shall soon be even and solid.

Travel compacts the roads, and the winds keep them level with the great plain of snow, so that in spring they are serviceable when all else is weak and oozy.

The plasticity of the ice is remarkable. Without rupture it adapts itself to the varying level of the water underneath; and the same thing can be noticed in large inclined slabs of the early upheaval, which by warmth and weight gradually nod to their fall. One such slab we saw exquisitely divided internally by sharp lines into a scintillating mosaic.

In a thaw, a touch breaks up these slabs into bundles of spicule, always formed at right angles to the plane of freezing, and revealing the varying cohesion of the mighty mass beneath us.

The little snow-birds fly about as if it were summer, and we wonder how they live with what little scanty food they may find on the roads.

Many of the teamsters, with their empty sleighs returning from the city, invite us to come aboard, with the natural politeness of Frenchmen; but we decline, and return home with the sun slowly hiding behind Mount Royal, and making the tips of the slabs into twinkling prisms of light.

Although neither my friend nor myself will admit that he or I feel it very cold, still we have decidedly improved feelings toward all such men as deal in stoves and coals.

DEATH-BEDS OF CHRISTIANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The flippancy with which Christians indulge in the horrors of the death-scenes of unbelievers, it seems to me, is not backed up with truth; or, in other words, they seem to have adopted a free use of pious falsehood for the purpose of persuading people to "come to Christ." Now I propose to speak of the death-bed of a Christian, and in doing so we shall see that in this case, at least, the wonderful preference for the Christian's death is entirely manufactured by the minister in the pulpit.

A near neighbor of mine (a man much given to prayer and talk about "the goodness of the Lord") was suddenly prostrated with severe nervous disease. A slight derangement of the mind accompanied it to the end. During one of my visits to the afflicted family, a brother churchman came in, and the sick man, just after unmistakable demonstrations of delirium, proposed prayer; during which he twice in a feeble manner shouted "glory." But during the night preceding his final dissolution, which came in about three days, the scene was too fearful for any one, unable to account for such derangement in a scientific way, to contemplate. The poor man was tormented with great black devils, and in the agony of despair begged his wife to keep them away. "Margaret! O Margaret! take the gun and shoot them great black devils. They are after me." And, addressing himself to the imaginary imps, he would say: "Go away! Get away! You can't have me. I'm on the Lord's side." Then, turning to his physician, he would say: "Doctor! O Doctor! Stay here by me, and keep them devils away." These and similar expressions followed in rapid succession, until the effect of morphine quieted his ravings into a slumber from which he never awoke. Now, if this man had not been a Christian, what a terrible example and terror to the unbeliever his death would have been! But the minister in his funeral discourse reviewed his sickness, and adorned it with "perfect trust in God," "an unwavering faith in a joyful resurrection," and described his death as peaceful, calm, and happy.

Another instance which came under my observation was that of a lady friend who died of consumption, and consequently had plenty of time for reflection. But in the different conversations I had with her, she expressed but little piety, though a church-member, and no particular hope or trust, but an entire ignorance of what the future is to be, saying: "I don't know," "I can't tell," "but as it is, so I shall find it." Being a woman of sound integrity, she had no false words for any one; but the minister at the funeral told of the pleasant religious conversation he had had with the lady, and of the strength of her hope and trust in Jesus; adding the stereotyped phrases generally pressed into service at such times. If such preachers cannot be charged with pious falsehood, then let it be called random talk, which is equally unpardonable.

SCOTCH PRAYER.

An article in THE INDEX a few weeks ago, about answer to prayer, or the intense faith some people have that their prayers are answered because they have advised or given directions about them, has induced me to copy the following from Mr. Stoddard's first volume of the "Bric-a-Brac Series." It is in the interesting reminiscences of Julian Charles Young:—"One of the most notable men for this sort of homely fireside eloquence was Adam Scott of Upper Dalgleish. I had an uncle that herded with him, and from him I had many quotations from Adam Scott's prayers. Here is a short sample:—

"We particularly thank Thee for Thy great goodness to Meg; and that it ever cam into your head to tak ony thought o' sic a useless bow-wow as her [alluding to a little girl of his, who had been miraculously saved from drowning]. For Thy mercy's sake—for the sake o' Thy puir sinfu' creeturis now addressing Thee in their ain shilly-shally way, and for the sake o' mair than we daur weel name to Thee, hae mercy on our Rob. Ye ken yoursel' he's a wild mischievous callant, and thinks nae mair o' committing sin than a dog does o' licking a dish. But put Thy hooke intil his nose, and Thy bridle intil his gab, and gar him come back to Thee wi' a jerk that he'll no forget the longest day he has to live. Dinna forget puir Jamie who's far awa frae us the night. Keep Thy arm o' power about him, and ech, sirs, I wish ye wad endow him with a little spunk and smeddun to act for his sell; for if ye dinna, he'll be but a bauchel i' this world, and a backslider i' the next. Thou hast added one to our family. [N. B.—One of his sons had just married against his approbation.] So it has been Thy will: it wad never hae been mine. But if it is of Thee, do Thou bless the connection. But if the fule hath done it only out o' carnal desire against a' reason and credit, may the cauld rain o' adversity settle in his habitation."

The last part of this prayer is left open. First it was God who had brought the couple together; but notwithstanding the work of the divine hand, the father boldly tells him he would have made a better choice. Then there creeps a suspicion about God having done it, and, if he really have, a blessing is asked; but, to be safe, in case he have not, a curse. Many such prayers I have heard myself in Scotland; but do we hear many more enlightened ones here? Are not all prayers inconsistent, and more or less blasphemous? If we believe unchangeably in natural laws, what have we to pray for? Or if, for us, prayer mean only thanks and praise, cannot these be best displayed in our lives? Does not "he pray best who loveth" and worketh "best"?

DRESS REFORM.

BY DR. W. D. CORKEN.

Feeling as I do a deep interest in the dress reform movement, I read with great pleasure the "literary notice" in the number of your excellent paper for January 7.

The subject of dress is attracting much attention, not only in the United States, but in the civilized world. We cannot suffer our beloved sisters, mothers, and friends to sacrifice the greatest blessing of life (health) to the caprice and folly of foreign fancy and fashion, without our solemn protest.

It would be impossible to exaggerate the inconveniences and disadvantages of the present style of dress, or the sacrifices that have to be made of health, comfort, dignity, and even self-respect.

That the fairest and most lovely portion of the creation of God should allow themselves to be deprived of the greatest blessing of life (health), is not only a shame, but a solemn mockery, in this age of civilization, when every woman in our free and happy country does, or should, understand the laws that govern life, and the consequences of disobeying them. I most sincerely hope that women, in every state and country on the face of the globe, will see the necessity of this "reform," as it will be a means by which many of the obstacles to woman's progress may be removed. A visit to the Dress Reform Rooms, 25 Winter Street, under the judicious and efficient charge of Mrs. H. K. Crane, will not only repay the visitor, but remove every prejudice. There surprise and delight will be expressed at the great progress which has been already made. Every requirement of Nature has been met, whether physiologically, hygienically, or aesthetically, and the foundation laid for a grand and glorious reformation in the dress of woman the wide world over. Dress reform is to become the most vital question; corsets are doomed to everlasting oblivion; and the day of freedom for woman's soul and body has dawned at length.

"Hail! happy, happy day,
When corsets all are done away."

WEST AMESBURY, Mass.

BELONGING NOT TO OURSELVES.

Granting that we are in the dilemma where Mr. Spencer's logic, from the premises that "property is robbery," puts us (of not owning our bodies), even then Proudhon's proposition is not thus disproved, "neatly," or otherwise. It is not even shown to be improbable; rather the contrary. Do we own our bodies? Or do we reciprocally belong to each other, our faculties and capacities of every sort, common wealth, to be expended in the service of right and truth? Does the intellect of Daniel Webster, the genius of Shakspeare, the philanthropic spirit of Wilberforce, Garrison, Bergh, belong to the individual possessor or to humanity? If so, what is the meaning of such a word as duty? Are we not rather responsible, if responsible at all, even for the moral conduct of another rather than for our own, since, as "conscious automata," we recognize, and can make the circumstances needed to insure, good conduct in others, though we must wait for external influence to modify our own?

By-and-by, ever so many years hence, of course, there will be universal acknowledgment that we belong, not to ourselves, but to the race; and the practical outcome will be that each will then employ his powers without waste; i.e., in that which those powers are best able to execute, and do it gratis, or for the pleasure of being useful. The financial problem will be solved then, for there will be no need of money. The labor question will be settled. There will be no idlers, and, none of us any longer over-worked, we all shall have leisure and inclination to explore and enjoy.

JOHN FRANCIS SMITH.

PROVIDENCE, R.I., Feb. 8, 1875.

THIS IS AN ITEM not to be printed in the Sunday-school books: A crowd of bad boys went bathing in Skunk River, Iowa, on the Sabbath day, and while the Rev Jabez Lynne was reproving them and vainly endeavoring to induce them to come out, a thunder-storm came up and the minister was killed by a flash of lightning. None of the boys were drowned.

A STINGY husband accounted for all the blame of the lawlessness of his children in company by saying his wife always gave them their own way. "Poor things! it's all I have to give them," was the prompt reply.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
 PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. ABBOT. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

HORTICULTURAL HALL

LECTURES

FOR 1875.

The Committee of the Free Religious Association, in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons, again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below,—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged:—

REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

PROPHETIC VOICES

CONCERNING AMERICA.

By CHARLES SUMNER.

Aside from its literary and historical merits, this volume has a special interest, from the fact that it was the last work on which Mr. Sumner was engaged before his death.

"PROPHETIC VOICES" will be found of great value to all who take an interest in the history of our country, so full is it of passages in which the unexampled prosperity of our land has been foretold by philosophers, poets, statesmen, and orators, of whom the lamented author has also given interesting sketches.

RADICAL LECTURES.

Having recently left the Church for the sake of freedom and truth, I am now ready to lecture on

LIBERAL SUBJECTS

to liberal people. I will speak on—

1. THE RELATION OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION.
2. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.
3. THE ANTAGONISM OF CHRISTIANITY TO CIVILIZATION.
4. THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

Other lectures also on interesting subjects.

I am willing to go West, if an engagement can be made for a sufficient number of lectures to make it an inducement; and to settle with any liberal society on terms mutually satisfactory.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, undimly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———.

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

For List of Liberal Leagues, see next page.

GLIMPSSES.

It is said that there will be sixty ex-rebel officers in the next Congress, and about thirty from the Union army. What does that indicate?

THE MORAL EDUCATION SOCIETY will meet next Friday, 3 P. M., at the New England Woman's Club Rooms. Essay by Dr. Caroline E. Hastings. Subject, "Is it by Inheritance or Education?" All are invited.

REV. JESSE H. JONES, of North Abington, will deliver a lecture, entitled "Jesus Christ or the Nineteenth Century: Which?" in the Cotton Hall Lecture Course, on Wednesday evening, March 3. The tickets to the whole course are 50 cents each.

FROM THE Montreal Daily Witness of January 23, it appears that the City Council have refused, by a vote of nine to five, to tax church property in that city. The large majority of the Council are Catholics. We call the attention of the Brooklyn Catholic Review to this fact, as it recently boasted of the liberal policy of the Catholics in Canada.

THE Dundee Advertiser (Scotland) reports Professor J. S. Blackie as having made this remark at a recent lecture: "Atheism, and the consequent negation of all religion which it implies, is an exception and abnormal type of humanity. An atheist is a monster, just as much as a woman with a beard, or a man without one, or a fox without a tail." One may as well expect figs from thistles as justice or reason from a bigot. Atheists are just like other men. If everybody is a "monster" who thinks for himself or differs from others, it will take the Pope to tell who of us all are not monsters; and he would most certainly overlook Professor Blackie in making up his own list of normal men.

THE DOGMA of the Pope's infallibility, it seems, is not to be the "sleeping giant of the Constitution," but a very wide-awake and terrible fellow: "The Milan Gazette says it is reported from the Vatican that categorical instructions have been issued to the priests in reference to confessions to be heard next Easter—at which season all Roman Catholics are bound to confess themselves under pain of excommunication. The confessor will be required, in the first place and above all things, to ask his penitents explicitly whether they believe in the infallibility of the Pope. In case of an affirmative answer the confession will proceed; but if the reply should be in the negative, the penitent will be at once dismissed with the warning that he has incurred the sentence of excommunication."

THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT SOCIETY held a convention at St. Louis, January 27, in which Dr. McAllister stated that two great petitions, one to the Senate and one to the House of Representatives, "will be presented to Congress without delay," in favor of that measure. A Mr. Ortleby having moved that Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, who had been referred to by one of the speakers as "the eloquent atheist of Illinois," should be listened to by the convention, it is reported that the request was denied. If the Christianizers won't even listen to protestants to-day, when they are on their good behavior, how will it be if they once get the upper hand? But we ought to say in justice that, at their Cincinnati convention in 1872, they listened very respectfully to a protest of our own.

The Independent is accustomed to intimate that we are very unjust to the missionary system. But its own abstract of the Sixty-fourth Annual Report of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, contained in its issue of February 11, is an astonishing confirmation of our own views on that subject. "The Report," says the Independent, "is very full in its list of missionaries; but the statistics of mission membership are far more defective than they should be." Exactly so. Plausible excuses for failure are far more plentiful than proofs of success. Glowing anticipations of the future are abundant; but it is fact, not rhetoric, that is wanted. At Natal, 75 laborers are reported, and only 556 communicants; in Turkey, 591 laborers, and only 4,659 communicants; in the three East India missions, 467 laborers, and only 1,633 communicants; in the two Chinese missions, 95 laborers, and "the results have as yet been small"; in the Japanese mission, 24 laborers, and only "20 converts"; in the Micronesian missions and the American Indian missions, no definite report; in Austria, "the missionaries have scarcely done more than make plans for their work"; "Italy has been abandoned"; "in Spain, there is a feeble mission at Santander"; in Mexico, "there has been some encouragement." With this exhibit of the results of sixty-four years, the Board wants $500,000 annually. "The receipts for the year were $469,470, and the debt on Sept. 1st, 1874, was $36,441." We submit that the Independent, when it comes to facts and figures, is just as cruel as THE INDEX to the missionaries. At this rate, how soon will the world be "converted to Christ"?

THE Board of Supervisors of Monroe County, New York, have reported through a special committee that property to the amount of over six and a half millions of dollars is exempted in that county from taxation. The committee's report contains this passage:—

The propriety of exempting church property has been fully considered, and your committee are unanimously in favor of a repeal of the law granting such exemptions. Whatever may have been the excuse or necessity for such discrimination in other days, there can be no good and valid reason for it at the present time. Universal freedom in religious matters, and the right to worship and honor God as seemeth good to every man, is fully guaranteed by our Constitution, and is backed by every man who can shoulder arms. What can church organizations ask more than this? Surely, they would not ask to be sustained by tax; and yet the exemptions granted have been this and nothing else. The time has come when our churches should be willing to pay their ratio and proportion in maintaining a judicious government, both willing and competent to protect them and their institutions.

This State has ever been liberal with churches, and the prosperity and perpetuity of the various churches have, to a great extent, grown out of this State encouragement; and now the time has come when the State should be excused from direct taxation for church purposes.

The law should be abolished; the dignity of the church and Christian manhood demands its prompt repeal, and every other consideration of an enlightened Christian character demands that no tinge of pauperism be associated with matters of religious faith and belief.

The third subject to be considered is the propriety of granting exemptions to clergymen. By reference to the page on recapitulation, it will be seen that we have in Monroe County 209 clergymen (too low) of whom 116 get more or less benefit from exemption, and 93 get no benefit whatever; and of course the reason is because they are poor, and have no property to exempt; and hence the same discrimination so palpably unjust towards the militia comes home to the reverend gentlemen, with convincing proof of its inequality. The statements given in regard to the militia and clergymen are so analogous in so many particulars that they should be classed in the same brigade of facts.

If it is necessary to sustain our clergymen by a tax (and this exemption is only another name for it), then it should become a general State tax, the same as for any State improvement; for then the poor, who most need assistance, will get their ratio and fair proportion.

Your committee are mindful of the important service rendered by our worthy clergymen, and the good which their permeating influence produces in favor of sound morality and Christian purity; but while they are thus mindful of their beneficial influence, they must regard a minister's reward in a higher and more exalted sense than can be derived from tax exemptions.

Your committee are unanimously in favor of a repeal of ministerial exemptions.

The Divine Decrees

IN THEIR BEARING UPON SOCIAL LIFE AND CIVIL ALLEGIANCE.

[An anonymous pamphlet published by Brown & Co., Salisbury, England.]

It must surely have struck all thoughtful persons as a marvellous thing that the keenest possible interest should be taken in ecclesiastical affairs by men who have clearly never considered it worth their while to reflect first upon the sort of life to which every one of them stands committed, supposing the current ecclesiastical dogmas to be true; and secondly upon the absurdity of wasting their time upon discussions so utterly unprofitable, supposing the current ecclesiastical dogmas to be otherwise than true. Speaking generally, it may be safely asserted that religious questions are the prominent questions of the day. If we pass over the temporary excitement created by the trial of Count Arnim, Germany appears at this moment as profoundly agitated as the German temperament is ever likely to permit, in her attempt to adjust the relations between Church and State. Spain is simply tearing herself to pieces over the problem whether Don Carlos has or has not received a supernatural commission from the Most High. Italy exists among nations apparently for no other purpose than to perpetuate a struggle for very life between things temporal and things eternal. And here in England, though liberty of thought protects us from the necessity of incurring any bodily risks in defence of our faith, and common sense forbids our rushing into a civil war—here in England we are so thoroughly engrossed with topics bearing more or less closely upon religion that ecclesiastical-mindedness may be said to be the characteristic feature of our times. Every newspaper, every magazine, and almost every book, either disputes, or defends, or takes for granted, some specific Christian doctrine. The clergy gravely meet in convocation, and the bishops are summoned to Lambeth to decide upon "Eastward positions" and damnable clauses. Parliament is occupied for half a session, and promises to be occupied for half a session more, in vindicating the bona fide Protestantism of the Church established in these realms. Honorable members talk enthusiastically to their constituents about the pure and simple faith for which our English martyrs suffered at the stake, and Mr. Gladstone sells upwards of a hundred thousand copies of a pamphlet on the Vatican Decrees. And yet, if the religion for which these august and formidable champions are putting out all their strength be a false religion, a mere myth, a set of popular traditions, like Paganism, or the superstitions of the Mohammedan or the Hindu, what a miserable waste of power is thus expended on its defence! While on the other hand, if this religion be truly and literally what it professes to be, the revelation of God's unalterable will, a distinct rule of conduct whereby the life of every one among us is to be fashioned after the example left us by Jesus Christ, on pain of judgments so unspeakably horrible that none of us can endure to think of them—if this in downright earnest be the sober truth, and if the whole Christian world admits it to be true, what manner of men ought we to be who talk and write so fluently about things which are matters not of life or death to us, but of life for evermore in the blessed courts of heaven, or of death which shall torment us to all eternity in the unquenchable flames of hell! It cannot but be regarded as the most extraordinary phenomenon of an age abounding in marvels, that this obvious and practical view of the question before us should be habitually ignored by persons whom it so very immediately concerns.

A ready solution of our difficulty—a solution, perhaps, more ready than substantial—will doubtless be forthcoming. Admitting the fact that all Europe is excited over the discussion of matters theological, and that every living Englishman among ourselves is forced, whether he will or no, to bear his modest part in the controversy, the reader may object that it is not the rule of Christ-like conduct, or any personal relationship of the believer to his God, or any theory about the joys of heaven or the pains of hell, upon which nations and governments and rival parties in the Church dispute so energetically. The question, he will urge, is not whether this or that Prussian Archbishop shall take Christ as the exact model of his daily life, but whether he shall submit politically to the decrees of the Pope, or to those of the German Chancellor. The question again is, not whether God will plunge every living statesman into hell who refuses to bear the cross of Jesus along the way of sorrows, visibly and bravely confessing his Divine Master before an ungodly world, but whether the religious society linked historically with the name of Jesus Christ is to be permitted to dictate measures for the guidance of the State, or the State is to overrule and keep in check the religious society linked historically with the name of Jesus Christ. In short, we shall be met at once with the bold assertion that the conflict between Church and State, between powers ecclesiastical and civil, between things temporal and things eternal, to which Mr. Gladstone has contributed a force so crushing and a feat of arms so brilliant, is a conflict not religious, but purely political.

Now, it would be equally impertinent and beside the mark to pronounce any opinion upon the light in which this or that individual statesman regards the theological controversies of the day. The religion about which public men dispute, and parliaments legislate, and the world in general becomes agitated, possesses without doubt a strong political element, and may be treated for practical purposes as an affair of politics and nothing more. The statesman may concern himself with Christianity only as a system of morals to be utilized for the benefit of society, or as an external hierarchy to be controlled within proper limits and employed as an adjunct to the civil power. It is quite possible to enter keenly into a debate on disestablishment, or to bring in a bill for the regulation of public worship, and yet to ignore utterly the effect which a personal belief in certain dogmas must needs have upon the life and conduct of the believer. Politicians and moralists are clearly at liberty, if they please, to accept the bare fact that Christianity has furnished the world with an admirable code of morals, and to decline entering into the question whether the reputed founder of this code was a true man or an impostor. But whatever may be the view entertained by individual statesmen, we cannot do wrong in refusing flatly to believe that religion is regarded as a matter of politics by any considerable number of Englishmen, or of Europeans, at the present time. Such a belief, if only we might accept it, would very materially simplify the existing controversies themselves. For if our hot discussions about sacred things be merely political discussions under another name, if we are fighting so vigorously about matters which affect, and are capable of affecting, our rights as citizens of this or that earthly empire, and our duties as subjects of this or that earthly king, it follows as a logical consequence that we can afford to throw aside at once all personal belief in the dogmas on which our religion is founded, even as the most loyal and conservative Briton has long ago thrown aside his belief in the theoretically despotic powers of the reigning sovereign of a country. Every one of us subscribes heartily to the doctrine that the Queen is the supreme governor of these realms; and yet not one of us is weak enough to suppose that Her Most Gracious Majesty, by virtue of that supremacy, can perform one single arbitrary action, or dispose of the life or liberty of the lowliest inhabitant of the British Isles. In like manner, it is quite conceivable that men should cordially assent to the truth and excellence of the precepts taught by Christianity, while they nevertheless reject as problematical and out of date the definite occurrences from which Christianity took its rise. If therefore we may be permitted to assume that Germany, and Italy, and France, and Spain, and England, with their respective parliaments, and convocations, and theological cliques, and devoutly-disposed families, and God-fearing individuals, are contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints with reference to its political significance only, our decisions on the general questions at issue may be pronounced with but little hesitation. Viewing them in the light of simple politics, we shall know pretty well how to deal with such questions as the Pope's claim to infallibility, with Don Carlos and his divine right, and the pretensions of the English High Church priest to offer up Christ as a real sacrifice upon the altar. But we cannot regard the religion of our countrymen, or of our fellow-Christians in other countries, as an affair of simple politics, because we have abundant evidence that it is nothing of the kind. Men who go to church, who pray at their bedside or with their family round the breakfast-table, who speak reverently about the Bible, are above all things anxious that their children should receive a sound religious education, and indulge in a vague and misty hope that they shall one day see the face of God—such men mean something very different from politics by their religion, and of such men almost the entire mass of civilized humanity is composed. The question is, What do they mean?

We shall the more readily answer this question if we try to discover, in the first place, what it is that they profess to mean. Fortunately, this inquiry is settled for us at once by a simple reference to those devotional treatises and confessions of faith which Christians of all denominations accept in common. In spite of our manifold divisions, there are yet some few points of agreement left to us—some bright but tiny plots of ground, in a world of jarring and discord, where even a Romanist and a Dissenter may meet as friends. Setting aside, then, the dogmas about which rival communions and hostile schools of theology dispute, we find every Christian man, to whatever sect or persuasion he may belong, confessing himself to be a miserable sinner in the sight of God; acknowledging that he is guilty every day of transgressions so atrocious that nothing short of the blood of Jesus Christ can suffice to wash them away; declaring that he richly deserves to be cast into hell, from which the unbounded love and mercy of his Savior can alone deliver him; professing his belief that this salvation will only be extended to him upon condition of his sincere repentance and constant endeavors after amendment of life; accepting Christ, the holy, the meek, the prayerful, as his pattern in every word and deed; condemning all the pleasures of this lower world as worthless if not positively hurtful, and renouncing them utterly that he may win the pure joys of heaven hereafter; and bidding himself remember with fear and trembling that, in spite of all his Christian privileges and tokens of Divine favor and means of grace, the lake of brimstone and the undying worm and the untold agonies of the damned shall be his portion for evermore, if at any moment he should make shipwreck of his faith, and love the fashions of the world above the law of God, and grow ashamed of bearing about with him the cross of Christ, and of crucifying himself upon it in the sight of all mankind. It is no exaggeration to say that this is the very least which every Christian man professes to believe, and that he who should be bold enough to profess any creed less comprehensive and less precise than this would most assuredly be accounted an infidel, or a freethinker, or a sceptic, by Orthodox persons of all denominations.

Lest, however, the reader should think the above sketch of the average Christian's professed belief an exaggeration—though we repeat emphatically that it is not an exaggeration at all,—it may be proved without the slightest difficulty that any set of dogmas less definitely phrased would degrade religion into mere superstition. Unless a man believes his doctrines to be true in the sense in which he believes that fire will burn and that food and air will sustain his life, these doctrines are to him absolutely nothing. Unless he knows for certain that Jesus died and rose again—knows it as certainly as he knows that his own lips are moving as he speaks—he knows nothing about Jesus whatever. A belief at which you only guess approximately, or which you accept because you cannot actually prove it to be false, is not a belief, but an ignorant infatuation; and he who worships God on the strength of such a chance that God may possibly be what he imagines him to be, is as surely guilty of idolatry as if he had fashioned him into the likeness of a golden calf, and paid his devotions to a senseless image. Take away from the Christian the reality, the certainty, the living voice, the infallible witness of his creed, and you take from him that which alone distinguishes his religion from the religion of the savage or the Pagan. There remains this difference only between the follower of Baal and the follower of Christ—that the one worships the creature of his hands, and the other the creature of his imagination. In any case, therefore, we are bound to maintain that the average Christian who goes to church and says his prayers professes to believe, at the very least, the literal truth of the few dogmas enumerated above.

And what must be the result of such a belief as this, honestly and soberly entertained? It would ill serve our purpose to color our picture too highly, or to write down one intemperate word. Exaggeration is fatal to every cause, and in common self-defence we would avoid the very suspicion of it. But we put the question fearlessly to every straightforward, intelligent reader, who loves the old-fashioned habit of making words mean what they pretend to mean, and is accustomed to expect, as a simple matter of business, that men shall stand by the logical consequences of the dogmas they advance; and we ask whether it be possible for the Christian to believe all that he professes to believe, or half of it, or a tenth or twentieth part of it, and yet to lead the life which the ordinary church-goer leads—to lead such a life, not as a thing to be regretted, but as a thing to be openly persisted in—to lead such a life, not because the weakness of the flesh has betrayed him into error, but because it is his right to lead it, his duty to lead it—because, as he is not ashamed to look you in the face and solemnly declare, Christ his Master has sanctioned such a life and has bidden him lead it? On the face of it the thing is so hopelessly absurd that we need waste no words in dealing with it. A man who is guilty of the blood of Jesus Christ, a man whose sins are daily crucifying his Savior over and over again, a man who at every moment of his life stands in peril of being cast into the unquenchable flames of hell—and this, be it remembered, is what every Christian says that he believes,—such a man could no more suffer himself to hunt, and shoot, and dance, and play cards, and chat merrily, and lounge, and laugh, and spend three or four hours over a pleasant evening meal, than he can bring down from the midnight sky one of the bright stars of heaven.

It is of no use whatever to reply that our argument proves too much, and that men who know that they must one day die, and are conscious of various dangers hanging over their heads or of various troubles threatening to crush them, are nevertheless able to bear themselves cheerfully, as if they cared nothing for the perilous future. For, in the first place, the guilt which lies upon the Christian's soul for which God came down from heaven to die, and the positive frightfulness of the risk which the Christian sinner runs, admit of no comparison with earthly guilt or earthly risks, and are incapable of being illustrated by matters of daily life. And, in the second place, even if it were otherwise, our charge against the Christian is not merely that he is able to forget that he has nailed his Savior to the cross, and that an eternity of insupportable agony is staring him in the face, but that he claims the right of enjoying himself as heartily as if Christ had never died, and laughs all day long as boisterously as if hell did not exist. Nor is there any sense whatever in the retort that we have forced upon Christianity a reductio ad absurdum, and are proving a holy life to be impossible. It is perfectly fair to demand that men shall abide by the dogmas which they profess to hold. If the dogmas are too tremendous, let them be given up; but if they are maintained as true, we must insist upon their natural issues. The Christian has no just cause to complain that we are treating him unfairly, if, when he tells us of a crucified Christ and an everlasting hell, we require that his life shall act out his doctrines. As reasonably might a juggler in the street, who had boasted of his power to perform a bond fide miracle, complain that we treated him unfairly if we asked him to stand away from his apparatus or accomplices, and show us that he had nothing hidden up his sleeve. If the dogmas are true, they will bear the strain of their logical results; if they are false, the sooner we give them up the better.

We conclude, then, that the ordinary Christian, however excellent may be his moral conduct, however kind his heart, however pure his mind, does not really believe in the dogmas to which his Christianity commits him; and, inasmuch as his belief falls short of a true and visible reality, we are justified in deciding that his religion, so far as it concerns doctrine and not practice, is neither more nor less than a simple superstition. And indeed we might almost have determined as much as this by a shorter process still, without convicting the so-called believer of unreality in his creed. For it ought to be diligently remembered, though in truth it would seem to be almost universally forgotten, that the Christian dogmas which fall so lightly from the habitual church-goer's lips are absolutely false, unless the hard historical facts on which they rest are absolutely true. A man easily persuades himself that he believes in Jesus Christ, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary. The sentence conveys to his intelligence the dearest possible meaning, and he has no difficulty in declaring that such is the time-honored faith in which he lives, and hopes to die. Nay, he would indignantly repudiate the suspicion that perhaps his views on such a question were otherwise than Orthodox. But would the same man submit to be catechized backwards and forwards on the dry plain fact to which his dogma pledges him? Has he ever thought within himself what being conceived by the Holy Ghost means? Does he realize the full significance of the word virgin, as applied to the mother of his Lord? Does he accept as a sober, substantial truth that on a certain day—a day on which the sun rose and set, and men went about their business just as they go about their business now—a child was born who never had an earthly father, whom angels came visibly down from heaven to worship, and to whom a multitude of the heavenly host, in the hearing of common men and women like ourselves, sang hymns of praise? It may be doubted whether one Christian in ten thousand honestly believes that these things ever really happened; and, when we carry the details of the Savior's life a little further on, the doubt grows stronger still. The words "ascended into heaven" are easy enough to say; but what are they worth, unless they mean that on a common working day, not so very long ago after all, a man, in bodily shape and substance just as other men, rose up from the earth and mounted visibly into the sky, in defiance of that unalterable law of gravitation whereby alone the order of the universe is maintained—that law which is the very security of our persons and our property, and which keeps us safe in our beds at night? Surely it is no wild assertion, but a sober statement of the truth, to say that whole congregations of Christian worshippers might be polled one after another for a week, or a fortnight, or a month, as fast as their votes could be recorded, before one man of sense and education could be induced to confess his belief in the literal truth of the above astounding marvel.

Having then demonstrated, as a thing tolerably certain, that the ordinary Christian's belief is not a religion, but a superstition—a series of dogmas which he accepts as theologically true, only because he is not in the position to prove that they are historically false,—we are bound in common fairness to consider whether after all the Christian can be reasonably expected to entertain a belief more definite and precise than this, upon the evidence brought before him. In this country, and among the entire mass of Protestants in other lands, the only evidence recognized as satisfactory or even admissible by the vast majority of persons is the Bible—the Bible by itself, telling its own simple story, and preaching its own words of inspired truth to each individual reader. Possibly we may find that the nature of the evidence thus presented to the Protestant inquirer is quite sufficient to account for the fact that superstition has taken the place among us of dogmatic belief.

It is foreign to our purpose to enter into the question whether the several books of the New Testament were written by the persons whose names they bear, or whether the various discrepancies between one passage and another are capable of being reconciled. Many learned treatises have been published, regarding the subject from every conceivable point of view; but it does not appear probable that discussions of such a kind will ever greatly interest the ordinary Christian, or ever exercise any considerable influence over his belief or unbelief. Those students of the Scriptures must always be very few, who are critically competent to appreciate the drift of the inquiry whether St. Matthew's gospel was written in the first century or the second, and whether St. Peter wrote two epistles or only one. There is, however, a real difficulty about the Bible which must occur to the mind of the very humblest reader, and which utterly forbids our accepting that book as an unsupported witness of Christian truth. Taking the Holy Scriptures in our hands as the explanation of God's method in dealing with man, we are at once brought face to face with the most unfortunate fact that whereas, during the entire length of the Old and New Testament, God is represented as dealing with mankind on one distinct and invariable principle, for the last eighteen hundred years he has been dealing with mankind on a principle totally different. The Bible is simply a succession of miracles, from the creation of the world in six days of twenty-four hours each, obviously related as a miracle, in spite of all that scientific men may say, and intended by the writer of the Pentateuch to stand out as the most marvellous exhibition of Almighty power, down to the extraordinary visions witnessed by St. John in the Isle of Patmos. Every page is purely miraculous, and is meant to be; in pursuance no doubt of Jehovah's express design to prove his presence and his workings among his people on every occasion by supernatural tokens which they must needs accept as conclusive. The same God who ruled the world during the four thousand years of Bible history rules the world now; and yet we have no shadow of a reason for believing that in the course of nearly eighteen centuries he has ever once wrought for us on this earth a visible wonder or a visible sign.

It must be admitted that a fact so remarkable as this, a change of government on the part of the Unchangeable so sudden and so incomprehensible, taxes very severely our faith in Scripture history. Nay, unless we can find some logical solution of the difficulty, Christianity, as the revelation of God's will, can no longer stand. It is begging the question to reply that we are now "under a different dispensation," if by such a phrase you mean that the New Testament is meant to supply the place of an ever-present wonder-working Deity. What "dispensation" can that be which breaks, all on a sudden, a continuous chain of evidence, and leaves us groping in the dark, cut off from all personal intercourse with our God, and having for our guide a book written some eighteen centuries ago, and capable, in not a few important instances, of bearing almost any construction which we may please to lay upon it?

It is wholly incredible that God should deal with us after such a manner as this. He who was of old so jealous of his honor as to violate perpetually the laws of Nature in his defence, so that men might be forced to tremble and bow down before him, he who loved the world of former days so well that he visited it from time to time in miracle, in prophecy supernaturally uttered and supernaturally fulfilled, in sending his own Son to set at defiance every physical law in which men had learned by experience and reason to put their trust, so that they might put their trust in Jesus crucified and risen again, and be welcomed into the mansions of heaven hereafter,—it is manifestly impossible to believe that he has now become so unmindful of his majestic glory, so strangely unconcerned in all that his creatures do, so careless whether they are saved or lost, whether they live or die, as to visit them neither with miracle nor prophecy, nor with any one token that he still watches, and works, and rules. How, then, shall we escape the inference that miracles have ceased only because men have grown too enlightened to believe in them; that in point of fact no miracle of any kind, no violation of natural laws, has ever happened since the world began; and that the Bible, which stands or falls by its miracles, is as much a set of myths and legends as the Metamorphoses or the Iliad?

There is but one escape from an inference so inevitable. Christ, when he ascended into heaven, must have left himself a visible witness upon earth, a witness personal, tangible, infallible, who should guard and interpret the momentous dogmas which were to save or to destroy men's lives. Such a living witness there must beyond all question be, and whether you choose to call that witness by the name of Pope, or Church, or United Voice of holy men and women treading palpably in the footsteps of Christ, is a matter, to us Protestants at least, of ecclesiastical etiquette rather than of practical importance. The Pope, of course, thinks the question a vital one, and it must in simple candor be admitted that his position is one which it is extremely difficult to assail. The nature of the case before us almost imperatively requires that the power of interpreting the mind of Christ and the right of enforcing the Divine Decrees should be vested in an individual, because it is to an individual alone that an absolutely final appeal can be made. And really, after embracing with more or less of enthusiasm and rapture such gigantic dogmas as the resurrection of Lazarus and the visible descent of the Holy Ghost in cloven tongues of fire, it is rather an outrage upon common sense to strain at so very small a gnat as the recognition of a vice-regent of Christ on earth, even though he claim to be endowed with supernatural gifts for the enlightenment of mankind, to be commissioned by the great Head of the Church to guide his people into truth, to preside over a vast society whose ministers are the channels of miraculously-imparted graces, and whose members are miraculously nourished with sacramental food. It seems scarcely credible that Christ should make our way less plain before us, when he withdrew from us his own bodily presence, than by setting over us some one living guide and ruler, who should be infallible and supreme. We in England however have cut ourselves off from communion with the Pope, and in default of some authority more precise we must needs accept as the living representative of Christ on earth the united voice of our church or the collective body of our ministers. But whatever be the name by which we call this visible witness ordained of God, the witness must in any case be infallible, and it must be supreme. If it be anything short of this, we are infinitely worse off in a spiritual sense, we know infinitely less of God, than the Israelite with whom he talked face to face in the wilderness, or than the alien Amalekite on whom the visible arrows of his judgments fell.

The question then which Mr. Gladstone has approached so skilfully is a question whose depth and import even that eminent statesman appears as yet to have scarcely recognized. The ex-Premier has mystified his subject by treating it as an affair of politics. It is no affair of politics at all. The issue involved is nothing less than this, and the sooner we face our difficulty with honesty and clear-sightedness and courage the better: Is there or is there not a spiritual, a supernatural, a miraculous Power, at work within us and around us? Can we or can we not draw down mysterious gifts and graces from heaven when we pray? Are we or are we not children of the crucified Jesus, sworn soldiers of his cross, confessors of his death and resurrection before an unbelieving world? Do we or do we not stand in imminent peril of being cast into hell, and tormented with the flames of God's undying wrath for evermore? It is mere straw-splitting, it is a shameful prostitution of talent, a contemptible waste of time, to bandy words about the details of ecclesiastical government, while we shirk habitually the one definite point on which every theological controversy turns. Does the supernatural exist, or does it not? That is the plain question which we have to face; and when we have answered it there will be time enough to turn our attention to the problem whether the right of expounding the supernatural be lodged in the Pope, or in some other witness appointed by God.

That Christians of every creed would theoretically answer this question with an emphatic Yes, every reader of these pages must be perfectly well aware. That all except a fractional minority of professing Christians practically answer this question, by the transparent worldliness of their lives, with an equally emphatic No, must be plain to everybody who will take the trouble to consider what those dogmas distinctly assert in which the Christian pretends to believe. That any belief which falls short of a positive certainty that the events on which the dogmas of a creed are founded took place exactly as they are described is a pure and unadulterated superstition, we will assume as lately proved. It follows that the religion of ordinary Christians among ourselves is a superstition and nothing more; and indeed nobody who possesses an average amount of sense, and who has been accustomed to observe intelligently the habits of his fellow-men, can arrive by any legitimate process of reasoning at any other conclusion. It is a very harmless superstition. If it does not greatly tend to the ennobling of the intellect, so neither does it materially debase the mind. Nay, it acts on a vast multitude of persons beneficially, frightening them away from evil with the threat of hell, and bribing them into the path of virtue with a hazy prospect of possible bliss in heaven. We may even go the length of conceding that we are in the first instance mainly indebted to this superstition for the uprightness of our principles and the purity of our moral tone. But not the less on this account is it a superstition, and not the less certainly does it imply a positive rejection of all true belief in the miraculous and the unseen.

If, on the other hand, we are prepared soberly to profess that there is a supernatural power at work within us and around us, that we can bring down marvellous gifts from heaven in answer to our prayers, and that the one absorbing business of our lives is to save ourselves and our fellow-creatures from the agonies of hell, we stand committed to a spiritual system which must needs be as supreme over every earthly duty as the soul is more precious than the body, as eternity is longer than time. And the representative of this spiritual system, whether pope, or church, or council, claims as justly the right to interfere with our civil allegiance, supposing the occasion for such interference to arise, as the King of kings claims authority over the princes of this lower world. It is simply a question of belief or disbelief in Christ. If we believe in him, he becomes the absolute disposer of all our actions, whether as members of a family, or citizens of a commonwealth, or subjects of the Queen. If we do not believe in him, in this true sense of the word belief, our eager controversies about church government and ceremonial and dogma are the imbecile babblings of a silly superstition; our prayers, our solemn mysteries, our confessions of faith, are worth just precisely what the devotions of the people of Ephesus were worth before the image which fell down from Jupiter,—neither less nor more.

WHEN Laplace met the late Mrs. Somerville for the first time, he said, in his lofty way, "Madam, there have been only three women who have understood me—yourself, Caroline Herschel, and a Mrs. Greig, of whom I have never been able to learn anything." "I was Mrs. Greig," said the modest little woman. "So, then, there are only two of you!" exclaimed the philosopher.

AN Illinois editor returns thanks for a centipede sent to him by mail from Texas, "it being," he says, "the first cent of any kind that we've received for several weeks."

[FOR THE INDEX.]

A CONSCIENCE FOR LIBERTY.

MY DEAR ABBOT:—

Your "Appeal to Facts" has been carefully considered. I do not see that you have given me any occasion to modify the views expressed in my letter to you; but I will go over the ground a little more definitely, in order that we may, at least, the better understand each other.

1. I find it extremely difficult to separate your "facts and truths" from your "personality." You are constantly so mixing the two that, if one would heed what you say, he cannot well keep you out of mind. If you are really anxious to "secure the appeal to facts and the withdrawal of attention from all personalities that obscure them," you ought more rigidly to set the example. You "appeal" to others and tell them "where they are," and with your "intense conviction" you seem to insist that, when they are where they should be, they will be where you are. Or, you say they are already there, only they close their eyes to the "fact." Hence, when they open their eyes, they cannot escape seeing you. If, as you assure them, they are indeed anti-Christians, they will insist on discovering what you mean by the term. And how shall they do this but by learning from your own lips what your anti-Christian science or philosophy is? That is the most I have endeavored to do. I have pointed out the antagonism between some of your convictions and the gospel of liberty. You entirely mistake the scope of my remarks, if you think I sought to hold you up as morally culpable. I am not in any such sense "my brother's keeper." I do not remand you to the "private confessional of your own conscience." I do not say you are "falsifying your own principles" consciously. Certainly your sincerity is above reproach. But I take the same liberty to tell you where you are that you exercise when you impart similar information to others. I admit that it is somewhat "irrelevant" to the proper discussion of ideas to do so. But when my friend salutes me, I cannot exactly ignore his "personality." It is far more congenial to my feelings to dwell in the climate of ideas; but now and then one must forego his pleasure to meet an emergency. I shall be very glad, however, to hear no more about "mental delusion," "paralyzed courage," etc.; for these personalities undoubtedly do tend to obscure the truth. Show the truth, and our task will be done.

2. But I am forced to believe that you will not readily consent to this. For one of your convictions appears to be that, when others fail to see the fact as you state it, you are privileged to jump to the conclusion that they are guilty of "stubborn prejudice and total carelessness of truth." You "mean no offence," but you speak plainly; that is all. I foresee that you may deny this. Let me refer you to one of your own illustrations. You imagine yourself as coming to my studio to tell me the house is on fire. The only response you think it possible for me to make is, "Guess not." You entertain not the least suspicion that I know anything about the "fact," but think that I in my ignorance will go on to berate you for your "spirit of infallibility." You leave me to apply this illustration to those who hold that "Christianity is liberty."* Notwithstanding, as in the case of "B," they protest that they have honestly investigated the subject. It is as though I, on hearing your alarm of fire, had said, "Oh, you are mistaken. The smoke you smell is a smudge in my ash-barrel, and the flames you saw were not real flames. I painted them on the wall the other day. In the dim light of the entry, smelling the smudge, you have mistaken them for reality." But to satisfy you, I go out into the hall, search the building through, and find no fire. Now that is precisely what B said he had done. He had searched Christianity faithfully, and did not find any bondage. Yet you say that A "should not hesitate an instant" to inform B of his "delusion," telling him how it will "deadens his conscience and paralyze his courage." And this you think would be "intense conviction" and not the "assumption of infallibility."

I know your argument, and will further consider it. You tell me that B has only his own interpretation of Christianity, and denies any obligation to "submit this private interpretation to any superior tribunal." If A did the same thing, he would then stand on equal terms with B, and could not "insist on the truth of his opinion without making in reality an assumption of personal infallibility." But he does not. You do not. You appeal from all private interpretations to the "Universal Criterion of Science." Let us see what this means. It is a little mystifying, but perhaps it can be fathomed.

The "Criterion of Science" admonishes us to keep close to facts. And these facts are to be determined by observation and experience. The question is, What is Christianity? Or rather, first, where is Christianity to be found? "History knows nothing of a Christianity not in the Church; experiment, applied to the world of modern life, fails to discover it." Now we may ask what Christianity is, because we have discovered its whereabouts. "Christianity is the religion of Christians, and the totality of Christians constitutes the Universal Church." What, then, is Christianity? Let Mr. Abbot answer: "Bondage." Now let the Christian Church reply: "Not a bit of it." Here is disagreement where I had been led to expect perfect accord. Who is right? What is the fact? Mr. Abbot has said, "Bondage." He will not "retract, modify, or apologize." He has "told the truth as it is," and knows that he has done so, because he has "submitted to the test of facts, and verified his conclusion by observation and experience." I am still in the mist. I want to know by whom was this scientific investigation conducted? I am reluctant to receive the reply, for I am aware of what follows. If the response is, as of course it must be, "Why, by Francis E. Abbot," then I am completely baffled in my attempt to discover whence he derives his right to speak with authority. I am reduced at last to the necessity of falling back upon his "private interpretation," and must value that for what I find it to be worth. If he proposes to argue the case, and to show me facts in the history of the Christian Church that prove his assertion, I must shake my head, for that is all wide of the mark. Others appeal to the same facts and obtain different results. B comes upon the scene, and they wear a different look. A new light is thrown on them, and their color changes.

There is possibly a kink in this matter I fail to see; but I have labored to the best of my abilities to discover any basis for your superior claim, and have failed. I do not mistake your claim; but I am compelled to disallow it. The "appeal to facts" is well. But permit me to say that your error lies in supposing that you alone make this appeal. The real difference between you and your Radical Christian neighbor is not that his "imagination" says one thing and your "facts" another, but that you and he do not agree in your conclusions as to what the facts are. I cannot in my own mind relieve you of that "spirit of infallibility" which is not "persuasive or pleasing," while you continue to intimate that his interpretation, as compared with your own, is only a "guess."

If I were to go into this matter to determine, as between A and B, for instance, which had pursued his investigation of Christianity in the most scientific manner, I should be compelled to give my verdict in favor of B. In the first place, he plants himself confessedly upon the right and the duty of private judgment. This, of course, is no guarantee that his judgment will be correct. But I admire and approve his spirit, and feel sure that I shall get from him no second-hand report, but his own judgment formed face to face with the fact he has proposed to investigate. The facts of this world are to each of us as we are able to see them. His ability may so far transcend that of all other men, living or dead, that he will bring from his research a new revelation. It by no means follows that, because the majority are agreed in one report, the minority is wrong, though that minority be represented by a single individual. All progress in science, as in religion, has come about by reason of some new private interpretation which has affirmed the fact to be otherwise than as previously reported and universally believed. So, instead of urging B to "get beyond private interpretations,"—a thing he cannot do unless he surrenders "mental freedom" and walks as one blind,—I abjure him to stand by them. Of course he will never plead that the "sanctity of this private interpretation protects it from criticism or challenge," as you wrongly suppose me to advise. His motto is not only "Liberty," but "all the light the universe can throw." Still he cannot drift away from his own interpretation of all that comes. He has heard of Christianity. Here is a church that professes to expound it. What does he get from this church? Interpretations varying and conflicting. He appeals to that which the Church interprets. Justice to the founder of Christianity, respect for his own veracity, alike demand that he should do this. Following back along the lines of history, he seeks the Christian ideal as portrayed by Christ himself. In so far as the Church has departed from this ideal,—he being for himself judge both of the ideal and of the Church's departure,—it is in his opinion, un-Christian. In his judgment the Church has so departed, and has made no faithful report. He thinks he finds the teachings of Christ to be proclamations of liberty. Therefore he is pleased to call himself a Christian. I may not agree with him; I may think his conclusion wrong; but I do not see that either you or I can make any "appeal to facts" that shall entitle us to pronounce his conclusion a "guess" and our own "knowledge"; or that his is a mere private interpretation, and ours the verdict of a superior tribunal.

If A shall ask B how it is that this Church has so uniformly in word and deed represented Christianity as "bondage," how he will account for so palpable a fact, I think B will find ample illustration. Historical parables must be numerous. He might refer A to our own national history. How is it that we as a people have so largely failed to interpret the high ideals of freedom? Would he suppose that a great nation dedicating itself to the "inalienable right of all to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," would for nigh a whole century unblushingly defend an institution of human bondage? That is the fact. Is A prepared to say that democracy is a failure? B might state the philosophy of the case something in this way. "The old laps over upon the new. For a long time people see the new through the old glasses. They do not with a bound go from old to new. It is a growth and an outgrowth; republicanism with imperialism; civilization with barbarism; Christianity with Judaism. The higher the ideal, the longer the time ere it is reproduced in the world's life. As republicanism is not republicanism when it defends bondage; so Christianity is not Christianity while it enslaves human nature. Instead of having got beyond Christianity, we have not yet caught up with it. We are living, as it were, in the old time before Christ was born." This would be somewhat in harmony with my own idea. I think that the new departure which Jesus indicated was from Law to Life,—from the kingdom without to the kingdom within. Very likely he never quite made the transition himself. Nevertheless his life's mission was to emphasize it. Now the Church was the symbol of outwardness. It represented still that first stage of human development. All instituted religion, all institutions, in fact, embody the same thought. Of course, there are things that are outward, and only so. These naturally require machinery for their locomotion. But the things of the spirit are under no such necessity. Form and ceremony veil and hide them. The machine but cumbers the ground. Now in my judgment the Christian Church has represented this outwardness far more than anything else; and whatever acts thus outwardly acts in opposition to liberty. And I think that as an institution it has failed, as it necessarily must, to interpret what my friend B would call the true Christian departure.

But I must confess that to my mind all this much discussion about the party name, so far as our practical duty in this modern world is concerned, partakes largely of the inconsequential. Do we discuss liberty? Let us say what liberty is. Do we discuss justice? Let us say what justice is. Do we discuss equity? Let us say what equity is. Thus matters are simplified, and we have made several removes from confusion.

3. A word further in response to your query whether I am "outside of things as well as names." No, I think not, for the reason that I am not inside of names; the getting within the one is tolerably good evidence you are out of the other. Yet I do not "protest against being named." You may call me "anti-Christian" as often as you please. Nor do I take "pains" to stand outside of names. I said only that that was where I "found" myself. It costs me no great trouble. I mean that I have no disposition to hoist the party flag. It does not follow that I may not, when I see fit, coöperate with others to some specified end. That will depend on the end sought, and the method proposed. Parties may have done service, and may still do service; because there are those who believe in them, and all such persons must work in their own way, and I should hate to believe their labor wholly in vain. Perhaps the difference between you and me is, that you do your "bolting" after, while I do my bolting before, entering. Once in, if I recognized the majority principle, I think I should feel in honor bound to stay. You may call this "jealous individualism," but you will have misnamed the thing I mean. I simply wish to be free to serve the world in such ways as I can approve. That is all. If that is "very selfish," then to be "very selfish" is my ambition. I wish to remain outside of an endless and profitless dispute. To my mind the general party name signifies nothing. Experience teaches me that I do not know with greater certainty whether I more agree with the man who calls himself anti-Christian than with one who calls himself Christian; with Republican than with Democrat. I have seen the two, and I find their baskets filled with pretty much the same things, though these may all be labelled with extraordinary dissimilarity.

4. You say, "With regard to the 'conflict of consciences,' I have looked in your letter for light in vain, and do not know what you would do when consciences conflict." The shortest reply I can make is, "Do nothing." What saying more commended in Free Religious circles than this—"If we cannot agree, we must agree to disagree"? Indeed, is there any other course left, unless we adopt the maxim that "might makes right," and force the argument? Then we have a pitched battle, and the weakest goes to the wall. Your words have warned me that I am treading here on unpopular ground. I shall not so "satisfy many consciences"; certainly not yours. Well, I must be "brave," and in no way "deadens" my own conscience by withholding the free expression of my conviction. I repeat, then,—supposing that we have first fully accepted the idea of liberty,—when consciences conflict, Do nothing. Wait, though it be until doomsday, if you see not the way to harmonious action. I do not shrink from applying this idea to all institutions with "uncompromisingness." "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off." If the public school system is not founded in right and justice, drop it. You will find it is not worth the cost of pursuing. Purchased at the price of liberty, you have sold your birthright for a mess of pottage. Alas! that is what America is doing to-day in a thousand ways. Now I would that we could correct all this. I would give more for the education of the country into a CONSCIENCE FOR LIBERTY than for aught else. If to this end you sacrifice your idol of a public school, it will teach a lesson by its death it has been utterly incompetent to convey in life.

Am I then opposed to Universal Education? Some may leap to that conclusion. I reply that I would simply make the practical operation of a free society a part of that education. A child may be educated in wrong as well as in right. If you trample on principles that ought to be held sacred to give him an education, the example will tell quite as powerfully in the development of his character as will his knowledge of books. It will be a salutary lesson for him and for all to learn not to do evil that good may come.

But you still insist that I have not shown how to avoid the "conflict of consciences." To "give up the public schools in order to conciliate the Catholic's conscience" will violate your conscience. I cannot deny it. All I can say is that, if this be true, you cannot have a Conscience for Liberty. Ought you not therefore to take down your motto, or let it henceforth read—"Liberty and Bondage Mixed"? I would give up the enforced public school, not to conciliate the Catholic's conscience, but my own. I should hope my good example would tell on him. If not, I would at least have done my duty, and disarmed him of any valid excuse. So long as there are in America two consciences on this question of freedom, there will be conflict. The problem is, how to get but one conscience on this subject the world over. I had supposed that in this country we had set ourselves with some degree of earnestness to the task of illustrating its solution. But so long as there are people who cry out that their consciences are violated unless others will come to their terms, I suppose the conflict cannot be avoided. It is this enforced commonism that is the disturbing element. I "show you how to satisfy everybody's conscience," by showing you that it will be better for each and all to mind their own business. When the attempt is made to establish whatever institution by a system of coercive coöperation, the evil begins, and there is no end of it. Voluntary coöperation is, in my view, not only the one method consistent with liberty, it is by far the most practical and effective. I think I do not believe in the "solidarity of the race" so far as measures are concerned, but in its harmony. And this harmony I claim will best be attained, can only be attained, by free individual action. What that action would be as affecting schools and universal education, it is not for me here to anticipate. I will now only say that I have perfect faith that the genius of the American people will prove equal to the emergency, whenever the beneficent sway of freedom shall be established. "First go and be reconciled with thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." When the South asked, "What will you do for cotton when slavery is abolished?" the abolitionist replied, "Do without it, if that is the only alternative." If you still ask, "What will the country do for education when the compulsory school system is abandoned?" I can now only reply: "Do without it, if that is the only alternative. I am no convert to the maxim that 'the end justifies the means.'"

* The fault was mine, but you mistook my meaning in making B say that "Christianity was bondage but now is liberty." I meant he should say that in its origin Christianity meant liberty, but the so-called Christian Church had in its name established bondage.

Yours sincerely, SIDNEY H. MORSE.

VENALITY.

WASHINGTON, February, 1875.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Wendell Phillips's letter on the capital and labor question (published in THE INDEX of Jan. 28) has fixed my attention. For myself, having never studied this question, I have no suggestions to offer. I see the peril as most intelligent men do, and if any one does not see it let him come to Washington. Congress is now investigating the Pacific mail subsidy of $750,000. I can tell you nothing about it but what you see in the papers. Meanwhile the sewing machine monopolists, having made enormous profits, are driving for an extension of their patent, which, if it succeeds, will deprive many a widow and poor sewing-girl of the means of livelihood. The express companies, too, are trying hard to get a law passed forbidding the transportation of small parcels through the mails. The post-office, it seems, is a very popular institution for the transmission of small articles, and greatly interferes with the profits of these greedy monopolists, who want the whole. If Congress is beaten by their little game, there will be no limits to the extortion of these vampires, except the limits of endurance on the part of the victim, the suffering people. It is the little things that count up in the aggregate, and off which the greatest profits are made. Hence, to purchase Congress, the monopolists throw their money right and left; for they see "millions in it,"—which, by the present law, are annually saved to the people.

The lobby is now reckoned a powerful, if not the most powerful, element in legislation here. The halls and ante-rooms of Congress are thronged every day with adventurers, and among them beautiful and dangerous women, who add their smiles and fascinations. But every now and then you will see faces in the crowd that make you instinctively feel for your pocket-book, and button tighter your coat. Inside of Congress, ordinarily, not much is going on, because nearly all the work is done in committee-rooms. One must go there to see the drift of things, and be familiar with all the winds and tides of legislation. The Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the Chairman on Appropriations, on Foreign Relations, on the Judiciary, and the Speaker, are the real rulers, the shaping and governing powers. They are the gods of the lower world (or House), while Jupiter sits in the White House, and occasionally launches his thunderbolt at a rebellious community, or obnoxious legislature. The people were more scared than hurt by his last one. It is not in that direction that danger is to be apprehended. It is in that spirit of corruption which writes "VENAL" over the doors of Congress, over every avenue to legislation, and which is creeping through all branches of the public service. It is in the use of money by those skin-flint monopolies and bloated corporations which adopt, as a sound business principle and as their first rule of action, the famous bon mot of Walpole, that "every man has his price." It is said—I hope it is not true, and I am far from vouching for it—that a seat in the American Senate can be bought now, as a seat in the British Parliament used to be. One thing is certain, that "money is power." And this power is corruptly used to defeat the true ends of government. Our ship of state would appear to be sailing in the inner circles of the great maelstrom of corruption which has engulfed so many republics before to-day. We are sweeping in nearer and nearer to the fatal point drawn by that gravitating power of incorporated wealth.

This is the danger, and no one sees it clearer than Wendell Phillips. But when he confesses, "I believe, I can't see," whence the cure is to come, we may well stand aghast in the presence of so gigantic and threatening an evil, so pregnant with unforeseen calamity which may be sprung upon us without a moment's warning. The late rebellion took us unprepared enough. But external forces can be measured, while who can measure the spirit of corruption? Who can, who dares, to probe this foul cancer of the body politic having its roots far down in poverty, ignorance, and crime, and slowly but steadily ripening to mutinous revolt—the insurrection of the many against the government of the few? For that is the meaning of a plutocracy, always and everywhere the same. But the deep and immitigable evils of which such government is the source and fountain-head can never be cured by a direct attack on the "evils," or by the "heroic method." Time is an element in the problem which waits for solution.

In a poem of Shelley's entitled "The Masque of Anarchy," an attempt is made to uncover the damning evils of a plutocracy, and the task is not unsuccessfully performed. The grinding slavery of monopoly, and the horrible vices and defects which it engenders in the souls and bodies of its victims are painted in strong colors, of which the awfulness is their very truth. Equally true and beautiful, on the other hand, is the picture of the glorious and emancipating effects of freedom. That was the remedy, if freedom in England were not all a dream. We in America have a better chance to try the remedy, having time before us, and a continent for room. We must convert the dream into a reality. But we must not allow the moneyed despotism to tighten its grasp upon our necks. We must arise in "unvanquishable number," and compel attention to the magnitude of the subject.

But the poem—where Shelley seems to have exerted his entire strength in the cause of the people. He saw the poor of England, the laboring masses, trampled down and oppressed by unjust laws, while monopoly, like a cruel vampire, was draining the life-blood of the nation. He saw the sovereign and parliament of England, the court and the aristocracy, the church and the law, and the sword even, flung into the scale of the oppressor, and all aiming at one object—to coin labor into money, not for the benefit of the laborer, but to support the privileged orders in idleness and luxury. And when the last drop filled the cup to overflowing, when the patience of the people finally gave way, and the many rose in revolt against the oppressive rule of the few—when, in 1819, the news of the Manchester massacre reached Shelley, then residing in Italy near Leghorn,—the poet himself, we are told, unable longer to restrain the violent emotions of indignation and compassion which agitated him, thought the time had come for an appeal to his injured countrymen. He put the trumpet of Poesy to his lips, and uttered that clarion cry. His object was to inspire his countrymen with a belief in the great and certain truth that the "many could control the few," by standing together long enough, as Mr. Phillips says, "to be counted." And how was that to be done? Why, simply enough; by calling an immense mass-meeting of the people, by passing resolutions, and putting forth a declaration of their rights. That was the way, that is the way—is it not, Mr. Phillips?—to gain that attention which you very properly declare to be here the half of success. For that is the sort of popular thunder which our venal press and politicians heed.

"Men of England, heirs of glory,
Heroes of unwritten story,
Nurslings of one mighty mother,
Hopes of her and one another!

"Rise like lions after slumber,
In unvanquishable number!
Shake your chains to earth like dew
Which in sleep had fallen on you!
Ye are many, they are few!"

HAPPY is he who expects little book-knowledge from the masses, because he won't be disappointed. The Medical Officer to the General Post-office at London mournfully concludes his report on the candidates for minor appointments in that department during the past year with a gasp of longing for compulsory education. These candidates were obliged to make written statements as to the medical histories of themselves and their families, and these are some of their sad but interesting expressions: "Father had a stroke, and I caught it of him;" "My little brother died of some funny name;" "A great white cat drew my sister's breath, and she died of it;" "Apperplexity;" "Parasles;" "Burrallger in the head;" "Rummitanic pains;" "Shortness of breath;" "Indigestion of the lungs;" "Tonzertina in the throat;" "Pistoles on the back." The country that produces such frantic and ingenious ignorance has a right to be proud to the verge of "apperplexity."—N. Y. Tribune.

THE Tablet quotes from old Roger Mervales' "History of ye Devils which Inhabit ye Human Anatomy" the following passage, which may be considered very reasonable reading: "The coughing devil hauntheth churches, and troubleth good folks mightily. He entereth in and taketh up his abode in the larynx; he favo'reth mostly ancient gentlewomen who visit often God's house, and on the Sunday when the priest readeth the notices for the forthcoming week, telling ye faithful that such a day is Mass, and such an one is Fast, this coughing devil is moved thereat with diabolical spleen and much envy, and leapeth mightily, and teareth at the throats of the old gentlewomen, until their pain issues in great uproar and noise, so that no one heareth what the preacher hath to say. And that week many good folk miss Mass on the Holy Day, and many more the Fast appointed. Thus God's work is prevented and the devil rejoiceth exceedingly."

WE can only hope to conquer Nature by submitting to her.—Selected.

MY STAR.

BY S. H. MORSE.

The noisy time keeps up the strife
'Tween things and other things,
And swift doth time take wings,
And death and life
Return,—the one the other brings.

I bid thee, fickle Time! go by.
I heed thy cry no more;
I shut, I bolt my door.
Into blue sky
I gaze through star-lit window o'er.

And lo! one star looks down at me,—
Yet stays it at its height.
Unerring falls the light.
I watch to see—
Will't vanish with the hours of night?

Oh! fade not till the perfect Day,
Thou Heaven-lit, holy star!
Thy beams thou send'st afar
Light the good way
Where hidden truths and treasures are.

O star of mine! I heed but thee;
Thy light alone desire.
Or friend or foe conspire,
Fate buffet me;
Thy mandate shall be higher!

A CONSCIENCE FOR LIBERTY.

MY DEAR ABBOT:—

Your "Appeal to Facts" has been carefully considered. I do not see that you have given me any occasion to modify the views expressed in my letter to you; but I will go over the ground a little more definitely, in order that we may, at least, the better understand each other.

1. I find it extremely difficult to separate your "facts and truths" from your "personality." You are constantly so mixing the two that, if one would heed what you say, he cannot well keep you out of mind. If you are really anxious to "secure the appeal to facts and the withdrawal of attention from all personalities that obscure them," you ought more rigidly to set the example. You "appeal" to others and tell them "where they are," and with your "intense conviction" you seem to insist that, when they are where they should be, they will be where you are. Or, you say they are already there, only they close their eyes to the "fact." Hence, when they open their eyes, they cannot escape seeing you. If, as you assure them, they are indeed anti-Christians, they will insist on discovering what you mean by the term. And how shall they do this but by learning from your own lips what your anti-Christian science or philosophy is? That is the most I have endeavored to do. I have pointed out the antagonism between some of your convictions and the gospel of liberty. You entirely mistake the scope of my remarks, if you think I sought to hold you up as morally culpable. I am not in any such sense "my brother's keeper." I do not remand you to the "private confessional of your own conscience." I do not say you are "falsifying your own principles" consciously. Certainly your sincerity is above reproach. But I take the same liberty to tell you where you are that you exercise when you impart similar information to others. I admit that it is somewhat "irrelevant" to the proper discussion of ideas to do so. But when my friend salutes me, I cannot exactly ignore his "personality." It is far more congenial to my feelings to dwell in the climate of ideas; but now and then one must forego his pleasure to meet an emergency. I shall be very glad, however, to hear no more about "mental delusion," "paralyzed courage," etc.; for these personalities undoubtedly do tend to obscure the truth. Show the truth, and our task will be done.

2. But I am forced to believe that you will not readily consent to this. For one of your convictions appears to be that, when others fail to see the fact as you state it, you are privileged to jump to the conclusion that they are guilty of "stubborn prejudice and total carelessness of truth." You "mean no offence," but you speak plainly; that is all. I foresee that you may deny this. Let me refer you to one of your own illustrations. You imagine yourself as coming to my studio to tell me the house is on fire. The only response you think it possible for me to make is, "Guess not." You entertain not the least suspicion that I know anything about the "fact," but think that I in my ignorance will go on to berate you for your "spirit of infallibility." You leave me to apply this illustration to those who hold that "Christianity is liberty."* Notwithstanding, as in the case of "B," they protest that they have honestly investigated the subject. It is as though I, on hearing your alarm of fire, had said, "Oh, you are mistaken. The smoke you smell is a smudge in my ash-barrel, and the flames you saw were not real flames. I painted them on the wall the other day. In the dim light of the entry, smelling the smudge, you have mistaken them for reality." But to satisfy you, I go out into the hall, search the building through, and find no fire. Now that is precisely what B said he had done. He had searched Christianity faithfully, and did not find any bondage. Yet you say that A "should not hesitate an instant" to inform B of his "delusion," telling him how it will "deadens his conscience and paralyze his courage." And this you think would be "intense conviction" and not the "assumption of infallibility."

I know your argument, and will further consider it. You tell me that B has only his own interpretation of Christianity, and denies any obligation to "submit this private interpretation to any superior tribunal." If A did the same thing, he would then stand on equal terms with B, and could not "insist on the truth of his opinion without making in reality an assumption of personal infallibility." But he does not. You do not. You appeal from all private interpretations to the "Universal Criterion of Science." Let us see what this means. It is a little mystifying, but perhaps it can be fathomed.

The "Criterion of Science" admonishes us to keep close to facts. And these facts are to be determined by observation and experience. The question is, What is Christianity? Or rather, first, where is Christianity to be found? "History knows nothing of a Christianity not in the Church; experiment, applied to the world of modern life, fails to discover it." Now we may ask what Christianity is, because we have discovered its whereabouts. "Christianity is the religion of Christians, and the totality of Christians constitutes the Universal Church." What, then, is Christianity? Let Mr. Abbot answer: "Bondage." Now let the Christian Church reply: "Not a bit of it." Here is disagreement where I had been led to expect perfect accord. Who is right? What is the fact? Mr. Abbot has said, "Bondage." He will not "retract, modify, or apologize." He has "told the truth as it is," and knows that he has done so, because he has "submitted to the test of facts, and verified his conclusion by observation and experience." I am still in the mist. I want to know by whom was this scientific investigation conducted? I am reluctant to receive the reply, for I am aware of what follows. If the response is, as of course it must be, "Why, by Francis E. Abbot," then I am completely baffled in my attempt to discover whence he derives his right to speak with authority. I am reduced at last to the necessity of falling back upon his "private interpretation," and must value that for what I find it to be worth. If he proposes to argue the case, and to show me facts in the history of the Christian Church that prove his assertion, I must shake my head, for that is all wide of the mark. Others appeal to the same facts and obtain different results. B comes upon the scene, and they wear a different look. A new light is thrown on them, and their color changes.

There is possibly a kink in this matter I fail to see; but I have labored to the best of my abilities to discover any basis for your superior claim, and have failed. I do not mistake your claim; but I am compelled to disallow it. The "appeal to facts" is well. But permit me to say that your error lies in supposing that you alone make this appeal. The real difference between you and your Radical Christian neighbor is not that his "imagination" says one thing and your "facts" another, but that you and he do not agree in your conclusions as to what the facts are. I cannot in my own mind relieve you of that "spirit of infallibility" which is not "persuasive or pleasing," while you continue to intimate that his interpretation, as compared with your own, is only a "guess."

If I were to go into this matter to determine, as between A and B, for instance, which had pursued his investigation of Christianity in the most scientific manner, I should be compelled to give my verdict in favor of B. In the first place, he plants himself confessedly upon the right and the duty of private judgment. This, of course, is no guarantee that his judgment will be correct. But I admire and approve his spirit, and feel sure that I shall get from him no second-hand report, but his own judgment formed face to face with the fact he has proposed to investigate. The facts of this world are to each of us as we are able to see them. His ability may so far transcend that of all other men, living or dead, that he will bring from his research a new revelation. It by no means follows that, because the majority are agreed in one report, the minority is wrong, though that minority be represented by a single individual. All progress in science, as in religion, has come about by reason of some new private interpretation which has affirmed the fact to be otherwise than as previously reported and universally believed. So, instead of urging B to "get beyond private interpretations,"—a thing he cannot do unless he surrenders "mental freedom" and walks as one blind,—I abjure him to stand by them. Of course he will never plead that the "sanctity of this private interpretation protects it from criticism or challenge," as you wrongly suppose me to advise. His motto is not only "Liberty," but "all the light the universe can throw." Still he cannot drift away from his own interpretation of all that comes. He has heard of Christianity. Here is a church that professes to expound it. What does he get from this church? Interpretations varying and conflicting. He appeals to that which the Church interprets. Justice to the founder of Christianity, respect for his own veracity, alike demand that he should do this. Following back along the lines of history, he seeks the Christian ideal as portrayed by Christ himself. In so far as the Church has departed from this ideal,—he being for himself judge both of the ideal and of the Church's departure,—it is in his opinion, un-Christian. In his judgment the Church has so departed, and has made no faithful report. He thinks he finds the teachings of Christ to be proclamations of liberty. Therefore he is pleased to call himself a Christian. I may not agree with him; I may think his conclusion wrong; but I do not see that either you or I can make any "appeal to facts" that shall entitle us to pronounce his conclusion a "guess" and our own "knowledge"; or that his is a mere private interpretation, and ours the verdict of a superior tribunal.

If A shall ask B how it is that this Church has so uniformly in word and deed represented Christianity as "bondage," how he will account for so palpable a fact, I think B will find ample illustration. Historical parables must be numerous. He might refer A to our own national history. How is it that we as a people have so largely failed to interpret the high ideals of freedom? Would he suppose that a great nation dedicating itself to the "inalienable right of all to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," would for nigh a whole century unflinchingly defend an institution of human bondage? That is the fact. Is A prepared to say that democracy is a failure? B might state the philosophy of the case something in this way. "The old laps over upon the new. For a long time people see the new through the old glasses. They do not with a bound go from old to new. It is a growth and an outgrowth; republicanism with imperialism; civilization with barbarism; Christianity with Judaism. The higher the ideal, the longer the time ere it is reproduced in the world's life. As republicanism is not republicanism when it defends bondage; so Christianity is not Christianity while it enslaves human nature. Instead of having got beyond Christianity, we have not yet caught up with it. We are living, as it were, in the old time before Christ was born." This would be somewhat in harmony with my own idea. I think that the new departure which Jesus indicated was from Law to Life,—from the kingdom without to the kingdom within. Very likely he never quite made the transition himself. Nevertheless his life's mission was to emphasize it. Now the Church was the symbol of outwardness. It represented still that first stage of human development. All instituted religion, all institutions, in fact, embody the same thought. Of course, there are things that are outward, and only so. These naturally require machinery for their locomotion. But the things of the spirit are under no such necessity. Form and ceremony veil and hide them. The machine but cumbers the ground. Now in my judgment the Christian Church has represented this outwardness far more than anything else; and whatever acts thus outwardly acts in opposition to liberty. And I think that as an institution it has failed, as it necessarily must, to interpret what my friend B would call the true Christian departure.

But I must confess that to my mind all this much discussion about the party name, so far as our practical duty in this modern world is concerned, partakes largely of the inconsequential. Do we discuss liberty? Let us say what liberty is. Do we discuss justice? Let us say what justice is. Do we discuss equity? Let us say what equity is. Thus matters are simplified, and we have made several removes from confusion.

3. A word further in response to your query whether I am "outside of things as well as names." No, I think not, for the reason that I am not inside of names; the getting within the one is tolerably good evidence you are out of the other. Yet I do not "protest against being named." You may call me "anti-Christian" as often as you please. Nor do I take "pains" to stand outside of names. I said only that that was where I "found" myself. It costs me no great trouble. I mean that I have no disposition to hoist the party flag. It does not follow that I may not, when I see fit, cooperate with others to some specified end. That will depend on the end sought, and the method proposed. Parties may have done service, and may still do service; because there are those who believe in them, and all such persons must work in their own way, and I should hate to believe their labor wholly in vain. Perhaps the difference between you and me is, that you do your "bolting" after, while I do my bolting before, entering. Once in, if I recognized the majority principle, I think I should feel in honor bound to stay. You may call this "jealous individualism," but you will have misnamed the thing I mean. I simply wish to be free to serve the world in such ways as I can approve. That is all. If that is "very selfish," then to be "very selfish" is my ambition. I wish to remain outside of an endless and profitless dispute. To my mind the general party name signifies nothing. Experience teaches me that I do not know with greater certainty whether I more agree with the man who calls himself anti-Christian than with one who calls himself Christian; with Republican than with Democrat. I have seen the two, and I find their baskets filled with pretty much the same things, though these may all be labelled with extraordinary dissimilarity.

4. You say, "With regard to the 'conflict of consciences,' I have looked in your letter for light in vain, and do not know what you would do when consciences conflict." The shortest reply I can make is, "Do nothing." What saying more commended in Free Religious circles than this—"If we cannot agree, we must agree to disagree"? Indeed, is there any other course left, unless we adopt the maxim that "might makes right," and force the argument? Then we have a pitched battle, and the weakest goes to the wall. Your words have warned me that I am treading here on unpopular ground. I shall not so "satisfy many consciences"; certainly not yours. Well, I must be "brave," and in no way "deadens" my own conscience by withholding the free expression of my conviction. I repeat, then,—supposing that we have first fully accepted the idea of liberty,—when consciences conflict, Do nothing. Wait, though it be until doomsday, if you see not the way to harmonious action. I do not shrink from applying this idea to all institutions with "uncompromisingness." "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off." If the public school system is not founded in right and justice, drop it. You will find it is not worth the cost of pursuing. Purchased at the price of liberty, you have sold your birthright for a mess of pottage. Alas! that is what America is doing to-day in a thousand ways. Now I would that we could correct all this. I would give more for the education of the country into a CONSCIENCE FOR LIBERTY than for aught else. If to this end you sacrifice your idol of a public school, it will teach a lesson by its death it has been utterly incompetent to convey in life.

Am I then opposed to Universal Education? Some may leap to that conclusion. I reply that I would simply make the practical operation of a free society a part of that education. A child may be educated in wrong as well as in right. If you trample on principles that ought to be held sacred to give him an education, the example will tell quite as powerfully in the development of his character as will his knowledge of books. It will be a salutary lesson for him and for all to learn not to do evil that good may come.

But you still insist that I have not shown how to avoid the "conflict of consciences." To "give up the public schools in order to conciliate the Catholic's conscience" will violate your conscience. I cannot deny it. All I can say is that, if this be true, you cannot have a Conscience for Liberty. Ought you not therefore to take down your motto, or let it henceforth read—"Liberty and Bondage Mixed"? I would give up the enforced public school, not to conciliate the Catholic's conscience, but my own. I should hope my good example would tell on him. If not, I would at least have done my duty, and disarmed him of any valid excuse. So long as there are in America two consciences on this question of freedom, there will be conflict. The problem is, how to get but one conscience on this subject the world over. I had supposed that in this country we had set ourselves with some degree of earnestness to the task of illustrating its solution. But so long as there are people who cry out that their consciences are violated unless others will come to their terms, I suppose the conflict cannot be avoided. It is this enforced commonism that is the disturbing element. I "show you how to satisfy everybody's conscience," by showing you that it will be better for each and all to mind their own business. When the attempt is made to establish whatever institution by a system of coercive coöperation, the evil begins, and there is no end of it. Voluntary coöperation is, in my view, not only the one method consistent with liberty, it is by far the most practical and effective. I think I do not believe in the "solidarity of the race" so far as measures are concerned, but in its harmony. And this harmony I claim will best be attained, can only be attained, by free individual action. What that action would be as affecting schools and universal education, it is not for me here to anticipate. I will now only say that I have perfect faith that the genius of the American people will prove equal to the emergency, whenever the beneficent sway of freedom shall be established. "First go and be reconciled with thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." When the South asked, "What will you do for cotton when slavery is abolished?" the abolitionist replied, "Do without it, if that is the only alternative." If you still ask, "What will the country do for education when the compulsory school system is abandoned?" I can now only reply: "Do without it, if that is the only alternative. I am no convert to the maxim that 'the end justifies the means.'"

* The fault was mine, but you mistook my meaning in making B say that "Christianity was bondage but now is liberty." I meant he should say that in its origin Christianity meant liberty, but the so-called Christian Church had in its name established bondage.

Yours sincerely, SIDNEY H. MORSE.

VENALITY.

WASHINGTON, February, 1875.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Wendell Phillips's letter on the capital and labor question (published in THE INDEX of Jan. 28) has fixed my attention. For myself, having never studied this question, I have no suggestions to offer. I see the peril as most intelligent men do, and if any one does not see it let him come to Washington. Congress is now investigating the Pacific mail subsidy of $750,000. I can tell you nothing about it but what you see in the papers. Meanwhile the sewing machine monopolists, having made enormous profits, are driving for an extension of their patent, which, if it succeeds, will deprive many a widow and poor sewing-girl of the means of livelihood. The express companies, too, are trying hard to get a law passed forbidding the transportation of small parcels through the mails. The post-office, it seems, is a very popular institution for the transmission of small articles, and greatly interferes with the profits of these greedy monopolists, who want the whole. If Congress is beaten by their little game, there will be no limits to the extortion of these vampires, except the limits of endurance on the part of the victim, the suffering people. It is the little things that count up in the aggregate, and off which the greatest profits are made. Hence, to purchase Congress, the monopolists throw their money right and left; for they see "millions in it,"—which, by the present law, are annually saved to the people.

The lobby is now reckoned a powerful, if not the most powerful, element in legislation here. The halls and ante-rooms of Congress are thronged every day with adventurers, and among them beautiful and dangerous women, who add their smiles and fascinations. But every now and then you will see faces in the crowd that make you instinctively feel for your pocket-book, and button tighter your coat. Inside of Congress, ordinarily, not much is going on, because nearly all the work is done in committee-rooms. One must go there to see the drift of things, and be familiar with all the winds and tides of legislation. The Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the Chairman on Appropriations, on Foreign Relations, on the Judiciary, and the Speaker, are the real rulers, the shaping and governing powers. They are the gods of the lower world (or House), while Jupiter sits in the White House, and occasionally launches his thunderbolt at a rebellious community, or obstreperous legislature. The people were more scared than hurt by his last one. It is not in that direction that danger is to be apprehended. It is in that spirit of corruption which writes "VENAL" over the doors of Congress, over every avenue to legislation, and which is creeping through all branches of the public service. It is in the use of money by those skin-flint monopolies and bloated corporations which adopt, as a sound business principle and as their first rule of action, the famous bon mot of Walpole, that "every man has his price." It is said—I hope it is not true, and I am far from vouching for it—that a seat in the American Senate can be bought now, as a seat in the British Parliament used to be. One thing is certain, that "money is power." And this power is corruptly used to defeat the true ends of government. Our ship of state would appear to be sailing in the inner circles of the great maelstrom of corruption which has engulfed so many republics before to-day. We are sweeping in nearer and nearer to the fatal point drawn by that gravitating power of incorporated wealth.

This is the danger, and no one sees it clearer than Wendell Phillips. But when he confesses, "I believe, I can't see," whence the cure is to come, we may well stand aghast in the presence of so gigantic and threatening an evil, so pregnant with unforseen calamity which may be sprung upon us without a moment's warning. The late rebellion took us unprepared enough. But external forces can be measured, while who can measure the spirit of corruption? Who can, who dares, to probe this foul cancer of the body politic having its roots far down in poverty, ignorance, and crime, and slowly but steadily ripening to mutinous revolt—the insurrection of the many against the government of the few? For that is the meaning of a plutocracy, always and everywhere the same. But the deep and immitigable evils of which such government is the source and fountain-head can never be cured by a direct attack on the "evils," or by the "heroic method." Time is an element in the problem which waits for solution.

In a poem of Shelley's entitled "The Masque of Anarchy," an attempt is made to uncover the damning evils of a plutocracy, and the task is not unsuccessfully performed. The grinding slavery of monopoly, and the horrible vices and defects which it engenders in the souls and bodies of its victims are painted in strong colors, of which the awfulness is their very truth. Equally true and beautiful, on the other hand, is the picture of the glorious and emancipating effects of freedom. That was the remedy, if freedom in England were not all a dream. We in America have a better chance to try the remedy, having time before us, and a continent for room. We must convert the dream into a reality. But we must not allow the moneyed despotism to tighten its grasp upon our necks. We must arise in "unvanquishable number," and compel attention to the magnitude of the subject.

But the poem—where Shelley seems to have exerted his entire strength in the cause of the people. He saw the poor of England, the laboring masses, trampled down and oppressed by unjust laws, while monopoly, like a cruel vampire, was draining the life-blood of the nation. He saw the sovereign and parliament of England, the court and the aristocracy, the church and the law, and the sword even, flung into the scale of the oppressor, and all aiming at one object—to coin labor into money, not for the benefit of the laborer, but to support the privileged orders in idleness and luxury. And when the last drop filled the cup to overflowing, when the patience of the people finally gave way, and the many rose in revolt against the oppressive rule of the few—when, in 1819, the news of the Manchester massacre reached Shelley, then residing in Italy near Leghorn,—the poet himself, we are told, unable longer to restrain the violent emotions of indignation and compassion which agitated him, thought the time had come for an appeal to his injured countrymen. He put the trumpet of Poesy to his lips, and uttered that clarion cry. His object was to inspire his countrymen with a belief in the great and certain truth that the "many could control the few," by standing together long enough, as Mr. Phillips says, "to be counted." And how was that to be done? Why, simply enough; by calling an immense mass-meeting of the people, by passing resolutions, and putting forth a declaration of their rights. That was the way, that is the way—is it not, Mr. Phillips?—to gain that attention which you very properly declare to be here the half of success. For that is the sort of popular thunder which our venal press and politicians heed.

"Men of England, heirs of glory,
Heroes of unwritten story,
Nurslings of one mighty mother,
Hopes of her and one another!

"Rise like lions after slumber,
In unvanquishable number!
Shake your chains to earth like dew
Which in sleep had fallen on you!
Ye are many, they are few!"

HAPPY is he who expects little book-knowledge from the masses, because he won't be disappointed. The Medical Officer to the General Post-office at London mournfully concludes his report on the candidates for minor appointments in that department during the past year with a gasp of longing for compulsory education. These candidates were obliged to make written statements as to the medical histories of themselves and their families, and these are some of their sad but interesting expressions: "Father had a sunstroke, and I caught it of him," "My little brother died of some funny name," "A great white cat drew my sister's breath, and she died of it," "Apperplexity," "Parasles," "Burrager in the head," "Rummitanic pains," "Shortness of breadth," "Indigestion of the lungs," "Toncertina in the throat," "Pistoles on the back." The country that produces such frantic and ingenious ignorance has a right to be proud to the verge of "apperplexity."—N. Y. Tribune.

THE Tablet quotes from old Roger Mervales' "History of ye Devils which Inhabit ye Human Anatomy" the following passage, which may be considered very seasonable reading: "The coughing devil haunteth churches, and troubleth good folks mightily. He entereth in and taketh up his abode in the larynx; he favoreth mostly ancient gentlewomen who visit often God's house, and on the Sunday when the priest readeth the notices for the forthcoming week, telling ye faithful that such a day is Mass, and such an one is Fast, this coughing devil is moved thereat with diabolical spleen and much envy, and leapeth mightily, and teareth at the throats of the old gentlewomen, until their pain issues in great uproar and noise, so that no one heareth what the preacher hath to say. And that week many good folk miss Mass on the Holy Day, and many more the Fast appointed. Thus God's work is prevented and the devil rejoiceth exceedingly."

WE can only hope to conquer Nature by submitting to her.—Selected.

MY STAR.

BY S. H. MORSE.

The noisy time keeps up the strife
'Tween things and other things,
And swift doth time take wings,
And death and life
Return,—the one the other brings.

I bid thee, fickle Time! go by.
I heed thy cry no more;
I shut, I bolt my door.
Into blue sky
I gaze through star-lit window o'er.

And lo! one star looks down at me,—
Yet stays it at its height.
Unerring falls the light.
I watch to see—
Will't vanish with the hours of night?

Oh! fade not till the perfect Day,
Thou Heaven-lit, holy star!
Thy beams thou send'st afar
Light the good way
Where hidden truths and treasures are.

O star of mine! I heed but thee;
Thy light alone desire.
Or friend or foe conspire,
Fate buffet me;
Thy mandate shall be higher!

REV. M. J. SAVAGE promises a reply to our article of last week, in which we criticised his "Christianity Notwithstanding." It will be sent in for next week's INDEX.

THE LONDON Free Sunday Advocate for January republishes three columns of the beautiful essay of Mrs. S. C. Hallowell on "Nursery Ethics," originally published in THE INDEX of August 23, 1873. The Advocate's honorable practice of giving full credit for all its selections we commend to American journals as an example worthy of all respect.

BARON ROSEN, in his Russian Conspirators in Siberia, thus refers to the Commission of Inquiry which examined the prisoners accused of complicity with the insurrection of 1825: "The president of the commission, Tatischtschew, very seldom took part in the inquiry; he only once made the following remark to the accused: 'Ypu have read nothing but Tracy, and Benjamin Constant, and Bentham; look what it has brought you to. I have read nothing but the Holy Scriptures all through my life, and you see what I have gained'; with that he pointed to the two rows of stars which glittered on his breast."

IN A printed circular addressed "To the Bishop and Members of the California Conference" of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Rev. D. A. Dryden has recently confessed some very mild heresies, which have been condoned by the Conference. A correspondent who kindly furnishes a copy of the circular is struck with the liberality of the Conference in retaining him as a member, instead of dismissing him as they dismissed another heretic ten years ago. We are chiefly struck, however, with Mr. Dryden's remarkable avowal of belief in Jesus: "In the divine-human or God-man Jesus, is revealed in personal unity all the triune of Father, Son, and Spirit. Outside of him I know nothing of a personal God whatever. To me he is the very and only God. And in him is all the fulness of God that I need or wish to know." This is the baldest and most absolute confession of Christian idolatry that we have ever seen, and it is well worth remembering. Yet idolatry of Jesus in some degree characterizes all forms of Christianity, and this astounding confession only holds up the mirror to it.

IF MR. VOYSEY will be so kind as to refer once more to the editorial he gently criticises in his earnest "London Letter" of this week, he will see that we sketched in two successive paragraphs the views of "some men" and of "other men," and then went on to portray (in a very inadequate manner) "some of the higher inspirations which are the gracious accompaniments of Free Religion." The passage he quotes is from the first of these two paragraphs, both of which describe views different in important respects from our own. The very point of our criticism of the views in this first of the two paragraphs was that man is a slave, "if God's arbitrary will is the ultimate reason of all things"; that is, if there is no higher explanation of life's troubles than the mere edict of arbitrary power. There is nothing noble in submission to mere power, and religion cannot make it noble. But if the grand course of Nature is ordered by omnipresent reason and goodness, of which omnipresent energy is but the executive side,—and this is the conclusion to which the deeper tendencies of modern science seem to us to point,—then it becomes possible for the bruised and tired spirit of the sufferer to repose in Nature without degrading itself by servile submission to mere inscrutable power. Our article was a protest against servility to the God of the churches, whose only right is his might. But it was anything but a protest against the self-respecting and dignified acceptance of the solace, strength, and peace which are naturally born from belief in the God of Science.

"A CONSCIENCE FOR LIBERTY."

MY DEAR MORSE:—

Your second letter, published on a previous page, is very welcome, as all your letters are. Please accept my thanks, not only for its kindly and good-humored tone, but also for the willingness it shows to discuss the questions at issue,—a willingness which I wish might be diffused in quarters where silence now reigns supreme. It is of no consequence who is right, provided we find out what is right, and the only way to find this out is the frank comparison of different views. I will answer the chief points of your letter as faithfully as I can, though without dwelling at all on many minor matters that would only prolong this reply to a tiresome length.

1. As I intimated a fortnight ago, you may settle the question of my "spirit of infallibility" in any way that suits you: I do not care enough about that to make any defence. But may I point out (a little mischievously, perhaps) that you seem to be about as "infallible" as I am? You remark: "I do not say you are 'falsifying your own principles' consciously." That is, I am doing it unconsciously—you being the infallible judge! Very well; I do not in the least complain of that judgment, which it is perfectly proper for you to pass, if you please. I would merely point out that this judgment of yours is precisely like my own remarks about "mental delusion," to which you object! The measles are about, but I have caught them myself, not the Neo-Christians; and the only difference between us is that, while I think they are sick, you think I am! Upon my word, I do not see but that you are as "infallible" as I, after all. You also say: "I take the same liberty to tell you where you are that you exercise when you impart similar information to others." Then why reprove me for doing it? To me it appears entirely proper that either of us should speak in this way; why should you think it right for yourself and wrong for me? Had we not better drop this personal irrelevancy altogether, and "dwell in the climate of ideas" which is so much more congenial to us both? The question is, does the spirit of liberty place all who have it in necessary opposition to Christianity? It is no answer to this question to say that I am "infallible" in my own conceit. That may or may not be true, but it does not answer the question.

2. When two persons both claim to have gone to the facts, yet make conflicting statements about them, what will they do, if they are rational beings? Will they each keep reiterating his own account, or will they agree to go to the facts once more, and submit them to a fresh and more thorough examination? When you tell me the fire I announce to you is painted flames in the entry and a smoky smudge in your ash-barrel, I shall propose that we go together to verify your statement; and if I find it correct, I shall at once say so. But if you decline to go, while I go alone and find the fire a real one, I shall be obliged to come again and give you a second "infallible" warning. Now all I ask of your Neo-Christian B is to go with me to the facts of Christianity, and examine them afresh. Some of the most important of the facts I have seen he wholly omits in his report of what he has seen; and nothing will be easier than to find out whether these omitted facts are merely in my own imagination or not. I admit the possibility of my being mistaken in this fancied sight of mine, and agree to submit it to a fresh verification in his presence. What I object to in B is his refusal to go with me for this purpose—his refusal to do anything but affirm and re-affirm his own "private interpretation" of the facts, without submitting it to verification at all. The facts I want him to see, and to admit the force of, are briefly these: that the great dominant idea of the gospels, taught by Jesus again and again, made the basis of all their preaching by the apostles, built up into all the historic creeds by their successors, and developed into Orthodox theology and Orthodox polity by the Church Universal, was the doctrine that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God," the Savior, Lord, and King of mankind by the Divine appointment; that this great doctrine is the very core of Christianity; that it has been always affirmed, and never denied, by every branch of the Christian Church; and that it is to-day what it always has been, the very foundation and essence of the Christian religion. My complaint against your Neo-Christian B is that he shows two faces on this subject,—one to the Orthodox world, when it charges him with "denying the Lord that bought him," one to the free thinkers, when they charge him with denying the principle of absolute liberty of thought and speech. To the Orthodox, B affirms that he believes in the Lord Jesus Christ as much as they do, accepting his teachings as a Divine revelation beyond all suspicion of error; to the free thinkers, he affirms that he admits the right of reason to sit in judgment on all things. He thus affirms and denies the supremacy of reason above revelation. What I ask is that B should face the fact that Christianity, in the whole course of its history and in its actual position to-day, binds him to submission, in mind, heart, and life, to the Lord Jesus Christ; and that this submission is bondage, and not liberty. This is the fact as I see it; I only ask B to look at this fact, and either admit it or disprove it. But this is the very thing that B will not do. Instead of doing it, he sings his little song of "Christianity is perfect liberty," and throws himself back on his dignity as the happy possessor of a "private interpretation."

But you say: "What, then, is Christianity? Let Mr. Abbot answer: 'Bondage.' Now let the Christian Church reply: 'Not a bit of it.'" With all deference, I must say that you reverse the verdict of the Church. Does not the Roman Catholic Church plant itself on the infallibility of the Pope? Does not the Protestant Evangelical Church plant itself on the infallibility of the Bible? Does not the Protestant Liberal Church plant itself on the infallibility of Jesus Christ? That is, does not the Christian Church everywhere and always plant itself on the principle of INFALLIBLE AUTHORITY, and must not every free thinker concede that this is mental and spiritual bondage? It astonishes me to find you taking opposite ground. I certainly deny differing from the Church, when I make the assertion that it rests confessedly on the principle of infallible authority; and I certainly claim that all free thinkers identify this principle with bondage. Will you, or will your B, identify it with liberty? If not, how can either of you dissent, when I say that Christianity is bondage?

I do not rest in my own judgment in this matter. I do not rely on my own "private interpretation." I do not at all assume to possess a "right to speak with authority." I do not make a "superior claim" of any sort. All these things are done by your B, when he sets aside the consensus of the Church as to its own foundation in the principle of infallible authority, and the consensus of all liberals that this principle is mental and spiritual bondage. If he denies that this is the consensus in either case, it is not my fault if he puts himself in the position of one who asserts that the moon is green cheese. Such an assertion may be undoubtedly an honest "private interpretation"; but it is usually heard nowadays only within the confines of lunatic asylums. There is a limit in good sense which is recognized by all the sane in disputes about facts. The universal reason counts for something, even as against the individual.

But you make this plea for B: "He has heard of Christianity. Here is a Church that professes to expound it. What does he get from this Church? Interpretations varying and conflicting. He appeals to that which the Church interprets. Justice to the founder of Christianity, respect for his own veracity, alike demand that he should do this. Following back along the lines of history, he seeks the Christian ideal as portrayed by Christ himself. In so far as the Church has departed from this ideal,—he being for himself judge both of the ideal and of the Church's departure,—it is in his opinion un-Christian. In his judgment the Church has so departed, and has made no faithful report. He thinks that he finds the teachings of Christ to be proclamations of liberty." Now to this plea I must urge two objections. First, B will "get from the Church interpretations varying and conflicting" in many respects, but only one interpretation in respect to the infallible authority of the Lord Jesus Christ: on that point all recognized branches of the Christian Church are unanimous. Secondly, if he goes back to the gospels for "the Christian ideal as portrayed by Christ himself," he will find the cause of this wonderful unanimity of the Church on that point to be the unanimous testimony of the gospels that Jesus claimed to be the Christ, the authoritative Lord and King of all. These are the facts. If B chooses to disregard these facts, to wipe out both from the gospels and the Church's interpretations of them the Christ-claim of Jesus and the infallible authority it asserts, and thus to metamorphose proclamations of bondage into "proclamations of liberty," nobody will dispute his right to assert these things any more than to assert that it is the habit of badgers to fly kites. But everybody will be at liberty to form and express his own opinion of such assertions.

You suggest that B, in order to explain how the Church departed from the ideal of Jesus, and came to represent bondage rather than liberty, might urge the historical parallel of a great nation's dedicating itself to the rights of man, yet defending the institution of slavery. The parallel is a good one, but it is on A's side, not B's. Every institution tends to carry out and develop its own fundamental idea. The fundamental idea of this country is that of universal liberty; and, although at the beginning chattel-slavery existed here in contradiction of this idea, the natural tendency was to get rid of it, and now it is gone. So the fundamental idea of the Christian Church was the Christship of Jesus; and, although at the beginning there was much individual liberty connected with it, the natural tendency was to suppress this more and more, and to develop the Divine authority of the Christ into the Deity of Jesus himself and the infallibility of his Vicegerent, the Pope. In both cases the same tendency asserted itself; but, instead of producing a departure of the Church from the original ideal of Jesus (the "kingdom of heaven"), it only developed this into its natural result, the establishment of a great ecclesiasticism based on the developed idea of Divine authority.

3. Omitting for brevity's sake the further discussion of parties and names, I will pass at once to the next topic of your letter, the "conflict of consciences."

4. The course you recommend, in cases of conflicting consciences, is to "do nothing." In the case of the schools, since the Catholic conscience and the republican conscience conflict, you seem to think that abolishing or "dropping" the public school system is to "do nothing," and for this reason you recommend that course. The reason you give for this advice is certainly one that I sympathize with profoundly—a wish to see a "conscience for liberty" universally cultivated in our country. But it is precisely because the American people have a "conscience for liberty" that they cleave so tenaciously to their public school system. The education given in our public schools is by no means all that it should be; nevertheless, it is the palladium of all our public and private liberties. Stop the schools, and deprive the people of the priceless advantages they now confer, and the next generation would see the last vestige of public freedom swept out of sight. Despotism can live and thrive where ignorance prevails, but freedom never. It is precisely because the people of this republic well understand that knowledge means liberty and ignorance slavery, that they have already a "conscience for liberty" that is the only safeguard of the republic. Do nothing! Is it nothing to dismiss all the teachers, send home all the children, sell or destroy all the school-houses, and leave the rising generation to grow up into helpless victims of priests and demagogues! Why, my dear friend, that is doing so much that I shrink from the very imagination of it. You do not in this way avoid trampling on the consciences of your fellow-men. You simply placate the consciences of the Catholic minority by outraging the consciences of the vast majority who love republican institutions. You simply take sides with the conscience for despotism against your own "conscience for liberty." You do not escape the necessity of violating somebody's conscience by trying to "do nothing." You have got to do something. You have got to continue the schools or to abolish them; and abolishing them is doing more, and worse, than defending them as the very apple of the eye. You have not guessed right this time, for you propose to trample on more consciences, and to trample with a heavier heel, than ever I have done. Whoever has indeed a "conscience for liberty," and equal rights, and impartial justice, will wish to disregard no man's conscience, if it can possibly be avoided; but when conscience is so debased by superstition as to protest in the name of religion against the education which is the condition of all free government "of the people, by the people, for the people," it cannot be any more regarded than the conscience which impels the Thug to murder travellers for the sake of appeasing his bloody goddess. "Doing nothing" is simply impossible in this matter of the schools: the only question is—what shall we do? Until I get more light, I must still say, educate every child, maintain the free schools, and oblige every citizen to pay his just proportion towards their support; for all the citizens, Catholics included, get their share of the protection thus ensured, and the Catholic has no right to make others pay the whole expense while he goes scot-free. And I take this ground precisely because I have a "conscience for liberty."

Yours ever, F. E. ABBOT.

FAIR INFERENCES.

An Orthodox paper prints with satisfaction the intelligence that "in the German Universities the Rationalistic lecture-rooms are now empty, and the Evangelical crowded; while fifty or eighty years ago the Rationalistic were crowded, and the Evangelical empty." The conclusion, not drawn because self-evident, not suggested because implied, is that Rationalism has had its day in the very region of its nativity and strength, and that Evangelicalism has reconquered its old territory and resumed its old sway. Granting for the moment the exact truth of the rather loose statement, and letting pass the facts that would seriously modify it, the reasoning from the premises might be mended without exhausting the intellectual powers. If all the Rationalistic lecture-rooms were deserted, the fact would simply prove that, in the centres of education in Germany, Rationalism had effectually done its work on the Christian Scriptures and creed, and required no further pressing. The minds it educated are employed in other fields of history, philosophy, philology, physiology, chemistry, celestial and terrestrial science; and young minds of the same order, instead of attending theological lectures of any school, abandon the Christian ministry and enter on other pursuits. There are Rationalists more than enough to fill all the theological lecture-rooms of all the universities; but other lecture-rooms suit them better. German Rationalism, having essentially modified the thought, not of Germany only, but of France and England, and through them of America,—having drawn thousands away from Evangelical Christianity,—having made tens of thousands more than indifferent to the Church,—having created a literature that is more efficacious in its service than all the lectures of all the professors,—having, in a word, established its dominion over the hardest working portion of the human mind, may as well close its halls except to the few who desire to pursue the technical study of theology.

But they who in Germany are moved to attack these studies are for the most part youths of an Evangelical turn of mind, whose taste is for the Christian ministry; and the lectures that these listen to are very unlike those that were delivered fifty or eighty years ago. Repeat those lectures, and the rooms would be emptier to-day than they were then. Evangelical Christianity has of late years become quite another thing; its dogmas have been abandoned or softened; the emphasis has been shifted; fresh interpretations have been admitted; the force of criticism has been conceded; matters once deemed of cardinal importance have been assigned subordinate and incidental places; reason is permitted its rights, subject not to authority, but to sentiment. And all this must be laid to the account of Rationalism.

If the Evangelical lecture-rooms are preparing the way for Rationalism, are in fact doing, under disguise, Rationalistic work, why should the Rationalistic lecture-rooms be kept open? All things considered, therefore, the intelligence that makes the text for these remarks is exceedingly cheerful for Rationalism.

O. B. F.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—In your editorial of the 31st December last on "Inspirations and Anodynes," you seem to have set forth with great power and eloquence the contrast between the manly spirit which is born of freedom, and the craven spirit which is the offspring of Orthodoxy.

But it strikes me that you have not done full justice to those feelings of courage and joy which are engendered by a kind of resignation not sufficiently recognized in your article. The words I wish to comment upon are the following:—

"Whoever encounters labor or pain simply because he must, and looks upon this necessity as an incomprehensible fact to be accepted with the best grace possible, submits to a cosmical government of pure force; and it makes little difference whether he considers it inexorable fatality or the 'immutable decrees' of God. One alternative is as rigorous as the other, and simple submission to superior power appears to be the only possible course to him who would not insanely dash his head against the prison walls of his destiny. But there is little in this to inspire, or cheer, or console. Man is a slave, and may as well be a slave to necessity as to God, if God's arbitrary will is the ultimate reason of all things."

Now, in the foregoing passage, I so far agree with you that, when God is regarded only in the light here represented, it is all the same whether he be called "God" or "Necessity," and the only kind of submission possible to one so regarding "Him," or "It," is the submission of a slave.

I venture to submit, however, that there is a view of God much wider than this, which is perfectly compatible with the willing submission of a son to a father, and which, where it exists in its integrity, is a source of inspiration and joy and consolation. Moreover, instead of weakening those sources of manly energy which you so ably eulogize, namely, the exercise of the affections and the sense of duty, this conscious surrender to the will of God adds greatly to their force as weapons against the ills of life.

The view of God which I commend involves all that science teaches regarding necessary sequence, and brings us to the conclusion that in every man's lot there is a varying quantity of the inevitable. Some pains and evils are certain to befall him. Practically it makes no difference whether you call the cause of this "Necessity" or "God." But it does make an overwhelming difference whether "God" is regarded as an involuntary, unintelligent force, or as possessing something analogous to a designing will; whether in fact the evils befall us with or without the consent of a friendly Divine mind.

In one case, there is, as you admit, "nothing to inspire, to cheer, or to console." In the other case, there is everything to inspire, to cheer, and to console.

If I believe that my troubles and the world's troubles are designed for the cultivation of manly qualities and of the tenderest virtue, which could not, under easier conditions, be called into exercise at all; then I have the double advantage of being inspired to do battle with the evils of life and to bear with equanimity such of them as I am unable to conquer or escape from.

If I believe that no evils can be endured which have not been permitted with a benign purpose, I submit to them—not with the abject submission of a slave, but—with the intelligent and grateful submission of a child who has discovered the loving purpose of his father beneath the crosses and disappointments of parental control.

If I detect that one object of my troubles is to elevate my character, surely it will inspire me to get all the good out of them I possibly can, and to do my obvious duty in conquering them on my own behalf and that of my fellow-men.

Further, if God be regarded as the conscious ordainer of life's toil and sorrow, and at the same time he be trusted to have only in view our supreme good, then surely we have a source of joy and cheerfulness not elsewhere to be matched. Not only our own lives, but the lives of others too, are lighted up by comfort and hope. Our own troubles are not half so hard to bear as the witnessing of other men's troubles when we cannot relieve them. And yet even this far greater burden is relieved by that view of God which makes us not only willingly acquiesce in his good purpose, but to shrink from the thought of interfering with a purpose so sublime.

To this source of inspiration and joy under trials must be added the thought of God's sympathy, the conviction that he knows what the sufferings of his creatures are, and therefore does not wantonly allow any pain to fall upon them more than is necessary. If God be only an unfeeling force, with no more consciousness of human sensibilities than this pen in my hand, it is quite a waste of time to think or speak of him at all. The less we trouble ourselves about the unseen mystery, the better. It would then be the truest wisdom to huddle ourselves together as men, and defy the facts as best we may, and curse them when they are too much for us.

But if God knows and feels, or has some power of sympathy (for which we have only human and defective terms in speaking of it), something analogous to what we call "Love," then, as a source of consolation under the most keen of life's pangs and the most bitter bereavement, belief in God's appointment of our lot is the very highest consolation ever felt by human hearts. It has saved thousands of the woe-struck from suicide; it has healed millions of bleeding and broken hearts.

Whether advancement in knowledge will make this view of God untenable remains to be seen. At present it remains untouched, and is enjoyed by some who are in the vanguard of scientific research.

It is of course no proof of its truth that it makes us happy; the first moment of all disillusion is a moment of intense pain; and believers in the love of God for themselves and for all mankind will not give up their faith without the most acute suffering. But they must and will surrender it, so soon as it becomes manifestly irreconcilable with eternal fact; but not before.

At present, every sound argument is on their side, and the balance of probabilities inclines more to it than ever. That such a faith is not more widely prevalent is simply due to its having been buried beneath the dust and rubbish of Christian dogmas; and what little of it had emerged and spread itself over part of the Christian walls has fallen with them, and is now sharing the general ruin. But we believe it is imperishable, and has before it a mighty future. Certain it is that it will strengthen and not weaken all that is noblest in man.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E., Jan. 30, 1875.

P. S.—Since writing the above I have read your lecture on the "Coming Religion," and trace in its magnificent conclusion an answer to much that I have herein said.

WHY AND WHEREFORE.

"The Liberal Christian expresses surprise at the large attendance upon Dr. Thomson's Bible-Class in Association Hall, New York, Sunday afternoons. 'Dr. Thomson's delivery,' it says, 'was anything but attractive, being halting, and frequently at a loss for a word, so that we could not help feeling very nervous lest he should break down altogether. We venture to say that, had a Unitarian minister endeavored to conduct such a service, the hall would not have been respectably filled, and there would have been little enthusiasm. Yet Dr. Thomson's Bible-Class is a popular institution, and draws crowds. Can any one tell us the secret of the success generally accompanying such movements in the "so-called evangelical denominations?" Is it because they are better drilled, and are accustomed to look upon such religious observances as matters of duty? How can we explain the extraordinary success of preaching and teaching that is of itself in no way remarkable?' Perhaps it is due to a remarkable sense of the difference between the word of God, and the mere words of man's wisdom."

Dissenting from the solution offered in the last sentence of the above paragraph, I would offer another, in the belief that it touches more nearly the core of the matter. Dr. Thomson (he is an M. D., not a D.D.) has, I understand, travelled in the East, and is able to impart a glow of reality to the text of Scripture which ordinary expositors do not understand. His audience is composed of evangelical people, who believe in the inspiration of the Bible, and feel bound in duty to attend expository lectures, but are grateful to anybody who will freshen up the old weariness with personal experience. I well remember in my callow days what a fount of living water seemed opened by Robertson's Oriental Illustrations, a very thin, ordinary book, written by a man who had been in the Bible lands. The reason why Unitarian Bible-classes are unattended is that Unitarians do not believe in the inspiration of the Bible, do not feel religiously bound to study it, and are not interested in knowing what it means. Dr. Bellows, too, has been in the East, and can talk about it more engagingly than Dr. Thomson; but, while Dr. Thomson lights up what are considered sacred scenes, Dr. Bellows lights up a heap of ruins. That is the difference. "Difference between the word of God and the mere words of man's wisdom," forsooth! That is begging the question. The difference is between those who think the Bible to be the word of God, and are happy to find it interesting as well as important, and those who do not think so, and who, not regarding it as important, cannot be induced to find it interesting. If the Unitarians would modernize the Bible as much for their people as Dr. Thomson does for his, that is, would talk about it as literature, not as God's word at all, perhaps their Bible-classes would fill up.

INNOCENT OF THEOLOGY.—A good story is told of Rev. Mr. B—, of —, in Massachusetts:—

An old lady in his church was told by some one who did not like his theological sentiments that he was an Arminian. She was greatly distressed at the statement, and went at once to her pastor to ascertain from himself if the charge was well founded.

"Mr. B—," she said, "I've heard that you are an Arminian, and I've just come right to yourself to know if it's true."

"An Arminian, my good woman," said Mr. B—; "why, I was born in Danvers!"

"There, there," said the old lady, hastening back to her informant; "I knew it couldn't be so, and it isn't, for I went and asked himself, and he told me he was born in Danvers!"

The old lady evidently thought the term Arminian had some relation to geography, and that her minister's birth in Danvers settled the question.—Editor's Drawer, in Harper's Magazine.

THE PROBLEM OF SPIRITUALISM.

OTTAWA, Canada, Feb. 9, 1875.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I do not quite understand your attitude on the Spiritualist question; there is too much indifference in it, considering the momentous nature of the subject. If the alleged facts of Spiritualism are facts, there is no subject in the whole range of human affairs of such transcendent importance; for they will be positive proofs that the thinking principle in man is capable of surviving the destruction of his body—a matter which has exercised the doubts, the hopes, and the fears of the greatest minds in all ages.

If, on the other hand, these alleged facts are no facts at all, if they are contrary to the whole course of Nature and the teachings of science, if the evidence for them has been examined by such careful and conscientious observers as Tyndall, Faraday, and Carpenter, and pronounced by them to be imposture,—then it will be but right that you should speak of them accordingly in unmistakable language. The alleged phenomena of Spiritualism are not matter of opinion, like many questions in speculative philosophy which are necessarily dependent on hypothesis; they are open to observation; they are either clear proofs of a state of existence for human beings after this life, or they are an imposition practiced by cunning minds on weak and credulous people. I cannot see any room for a half-way opinion in the matter.

That there is a great lack of the faculty for weighing evidence, as well as child-like credulity, in the great mass of believers in Spiritualism, seems to be beyond question. The bare fact that these things take place in darkness, one would suppose, would be sufficient in itself to excite suspicion. How is it that the spirits cannot make themselves known in daylight? Why is it that they have such power of movement as to answer at a moment's notice a call from either side of the Atlantic, and yet cannot communicate by any other method than the ridiculous and clumsy one of rapping out their responses alphabetically through the legs of a table? The whole matter is surrounded with suspicious circumstances sufficient to raise doubts in any minds but the most credulous. Why are the spirits so reticent in the presence of unbelievers? That is precisely the time to distinguish themselves. Why did their communications come to so abrupt a close at the instant Professor Tyndall got under the table?

One of your correspondents, with an air of triumph, falls back on the fact that tables do move, although "Faraday pronounced it to be impossible." Faraday did not say it was impossible that tables should move; but he proved to the satisfaction of all sane people that they moved because they were pushed unconsciously by the excited people sitting round them. The testimony of a man of science like Faraday, in such a matter, is of far greater value than that of the weak-minded women and men who usually assemble on such occasions.

At the risk of being charged with "dogmatic materialism," I should like to state some of the reasons for saying that Spiritualism is contrary to the course of Nature. The new views in biology known as Darwinism, which have in recent years met with such general acceptance from men of science and thinking people generally, have already had a great effect in modifying current beliefs. If it be admitted that the difference in mental faculties between man and the lower animals is a difference in degree, and not in kind, it will very materially affect our views as to the thinking principle in man. Every organism (man included) comes into existence as an almost imperceptible speck; it grows in bulk, attains to maturity, decays, dies, and finally every vestige of its form disappears. The materials of which it was composed enter into new combinations in other creatures, to run the same career; but the original form never reappears. This may be said to be the great law of organic existence, and certainly gives no countenance to Spiritualistic theories. Not less opposed to these theories is the science which treats of the conservation of energy. From this we learn that no movement takes place without an expenditure of force. Applied to the phenomena of the human mind, it teaches us that every mental act, every thought and emotion, no matter how trivial or how intense it may be, is accompanied by an equivalent expenditure of material in the blood-vessels of the brain. Now the spirits which roam about from world to world, and from continent to continent, must expend some force in their movements, as well as in the energetic concussions which they impart to tables and other furniture; and, as they have no organs of digestion and assimilation, and no materials of nutrition to digest and assimilate, it is not easy to see how they can repair their wasted forces. Illustrations of a like kind could easily be multiplied, did space permit. I cannot help thinking that it is a great pity so much energy should be wasted in this vain pursuit of Spiritualism. Were the time and means thus spent devoted to the study of natural laws, accompanied by an earnest desire to conform to them in conduct, great things might be accomplished.

Yours truly,

J. G. WHYTE.

[We have not the slightest reluctance to state tersely our "attitude on the Spiritualist question." Doubtless the brevity to which we are now compelled will expose us to misunderstanding, and probably attack; but that makes no difference, of course.

1. We have witnessed a great many Spiritualist phenomena, but have never yet seen anything whatever to convince us that spirits had anything to do with them.

2. The larger part of the phenomena exhibited by paid mediums in our presence we believe to have been fraudulent tricks, practised for the sake of gain upon warm-hearted and affectionate people whose sorrows predisposed them to accept almost any evidence that their lost friends survived in another state of conscious existence. Some of these tricks we have seen through, and others not.

3. The smaller part of the phenomena, especially those not exhibited by paid mediums, but exhibited or narrated by uninterested parties, we have nothing but guesses to account for—sometimes not even guesses. Respecting these we have no positive opinion, but think it probable that greater psychological knowledge will explain them.

4. As to the continuance of conscious individuality after death, we believe nothing, but hope a great deal. Science to-day is a mere baby; what it will teach when mature, it is for no man to pronounce. But we reverence the dignity of intellectual and moral life so profoundly, that we would treat with the utmost tenderness man's hope of its continuance after death; and we see no reason whatever to consider this hope either irrational or superstitious. Meanwhile we hold that it concerns us all to purify and elevate the quality of our life here, to the end that, if immortal, we may be highly fitted for that untried existence, and that, if not immortal, we may quit this present life with the proud consciousness of having used it nobly, usefully, and greatly.—ED.]

SPIRITUALISM.

I was pleased with the comments of Mr. A. W. S. on this subject in a late issue of THE INDEX. Though there seems to be an inclination among many radicals to ignore the idea of a spiritual existence beyond this bodily organism, it is to me the most serious and frequent thought of my mind. I find all of my deepest reflections on life and its manifold problems tending to this idea of an after life. Freethinking has not abated, but increased, my interest in this subject. I think more earnestly about the future life as I widen my sphere of thought on other subjects. The more I study human nature, the stronger becomes the conviction that man's destiny is not completed in this life. I cannot soar to the "spirit land" on the intuitional enthusiasm on which some reach this goal of hope. In my most hopeful moods I am conscious of my darksome environment, and painfully sensible of shadowy doubts and fears. But these same fears and doubts reassure me that there is reality somewhere and somehow for the hope of a future existence; for how could the mind conceive ideas as foreign from its destiny as these would be, were man not drawing his thoughts from the fountain of his own immortal being?

I fully realize that it is very difficult to argue in favor of immortality without appearing to the rigid rationalist dogmatic. The evidence (outside of the so-called "spiritual phenomena") is not so tangible as that on which we base our ordinary beliefs, and many of those trained in the school of a philosophy whose premises are sensible facts cannot see anything more than superstitious credulity in the doctrine of a future existence. But there is quite as much dogmatism manifested by those disciples of science who presume that they have reached the limit of the "knowable," and boldly declare all efforts to satisfy the questionings of the soul concerning its future destiny vain and delusive. Do we thoroughly understand all the mysteries of mind? Must we not confess that science has not intelligently compassed this field of phenomena? Who can assert that a clearer knowledge of this department of Nature will not lead to a more rational idea of immortality? The sphere of knowledge is ever widening, and the vague dreams of yesterday become the reliable scientific data of to-day. The dark shadows that mantle the unknown are constantly retiring before the advancing light of knowledge, and new truths are daily added to the treasures of science. Should not this teach us confidence with respect to the hopes of those who look for more light on the subject of man's destiny?

I am frank to confess that immortality has not been proven to me. That many stubborn objections at times obstruct my search for a foundation for this hope I also admit; but I am not willing to say that my subjective state is the highest possible condition for investigating the subject, and that my knowledge is the final limit of man's comprehension of his being. If there is a spiritual existence outside of this life, I believe it is a natural existence, subject to and controlled by fixed laws as this life is; and hence its truths accessible through a natural process of investigation. But I do not know what conditions may be necessary to bring this world of "untried being" under the scrutinizing eye of science. Can any student of physical science affirm that he has all of the conditions necessary for the fullest discovery in any experiment he may make in the investigation of his subject? Have great discoveries in other fields of research been the fruits of the first efforts of those who explored the "unknown" for new truths? Why should we be so impatient, then, toward the tardiness of spiritual discoveries?

All the "phenomena of Spiritualism" known at present may pass away as "subjective delusions," and Spiritualism yet be demonstrated by other methods of investigation which the scientific facilities of the future may furnish. I too am glad that this investigation is so persistently prosecuted. I am not satisfied with the present glimmering light from this source. If immortality should receive a rational demonstration from this investigation, I should hail it as the grandest discovery ever made by the truth-seeking mind of man. Let us not, then, look with intolerance on those who persist in trying to satisfy the spiritual wants of man's nature by questioning the viewless inhabitants of the "spirit world" concerning their mysterious being and its relation to our mode of existence.

CIVILIZED MONEY.

"The spirit of the age is the sphinx, giving us the labor problem as the enigma we are to read aright, on pain of being devoured."—Thos. J. Durant.

SPECIFIC PAYMENTS BETTER THAN SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Let it be borne in mind that there are two kinds of wealth in this world,—natural wealth, which is the product of Nature or the gift of God, whichever terms the reader may choose, and the wealth which is produced by the labor or exertion of mankind. The former cannot rightfully be the property of any one, while the latter belongs to each person according to the exertion made or cost (sacrifice) incurred by each in its production. If governments are ever to be anything but a curse to mankind, they must conserve and supervise all natural wealth for the equal benefit of all, and provide a medium of exchange, or money, for the equitable exchange of labor, service, or property (as herein defined).

All money hitherto in use has been, at best, only semi-civilized; and the paramount want of this age, and especially of this nation, is a civilized money. The following money system is proposed and offered for criticism—a system based upon labor or service, and issued only in payment for labor or service, or the products of the same.

To this end the government must become an employer to a much larger extent than at present; and yet it is not herein proposed for the government to enter upon any business not already performed by this and other governments, as will be seen. The propositions are as follows:—

I. The issuing by the national government of promissory notes (similar to "greenbacks") to the amount of the cost of the postal business of the United States (say twenty-five millions of dollars per annum), and receivable in payment for postal service and all other government dues.

II. That the national or State governments furnish railroad transit for freight and passengers at cost (precisely as it has always done the postal business), and that they issue promissory notes for railroads purchased, and for the labor and material employed in constructing others, to the amount of the cost of said roads and management, and redeemable in such railroad service and all other government dues. To this end the government must purchase all existing railroads at an equitable price, or build new ones parallel with those already existing, and build new ones whenever needed. Canal, river, and ocean transportation could be included.

III. That the national or State governments take possession, by equitable purchase, of all the mines and quarries of every description within the jurisdiction of the United States, and work them at cost; and that they issue promissory notes (similar to greenbacks) in payment for the purchase, labor, material, and management of such mines and quarries, to the amount of the costs thereof, and redeemable in the products of said mines and quarries at cost price, and also for all government dues.

IV. That the national or State governments furnish the telegraphing of the country on the foregoing principle.

V. That, wherever gas or water is introduced to supply large towns and cities, it should be done by the town and city corporations on the same principle.

VI. That the government (State or national) provide storehouses (as it now provides warehouses for the storage of imported goods) where labor products (not too perishable) may be deposited, and treasury notes, similar to greenbacks, issued to the depositor to the amount of fifty per cent., promising, not only dollars, but the commodities themselves, in definite quality and quantity, estimated and priced at the labor cost of the same. These departments of business, if managed by the national, State, or municipal government, as the postal business is now conducted, would probably furnish all the circulating medium or currency necessary, and there could never be too much, unless there be too many deeds of real estate, because not a dollar of it would be issued by the government until after the service or commodity was deposited in custody of the government, in which every dollar is to be redeemed. It would be the safest and soundest possible; it would be issued and redeemed naturally and without interest.

The following are specimens of the reading of the kind of money proposed, of the denomination of one dollar:—

The United States promise to pay one dollar to bearer on demand, in freight or passage on any United States railroad, at the rate of — cents per mile for one passenger, or — cents per cwt. for freight. This note is receivable for all debts due the United States.

The United States promise to pay one dollar to bearer on demand, in — cwt. of anthracite or other coal at the mine. This note is receivable for all debts due the United States.

The United States promise to pay one dollar to bearer on demand, in — oz. of unalloyed silver at the United States Treasury. This note is receivable for all debts due the United States.

one dollar in — grains of gold eighteen carats fine at the United States Treasury. This note is receivable for all debts due the United States.

In case of wheat deposited by a farmer, let the note read as follows:—

The United States will pay one dollar to bearer on demand, in — bushels of Illinois fall wheat at United States No. 1 Storehouse, No. 12 River Street, Chicago, Illinois. This note receivable for all debts due the United States.

A "dollar" as now used is no more the measure of either "costs" or "values" than an India-rubber yard-stick would be the measure of cloth.

The kind of notes above proposed promise something definite to measure the dollar by, and it is thought that the different kinds of labor, or service, and commodities included in the foregoing notes, may be sufficient to compare all other labor or service to, and to measure it by; and that therefore all notes issued by the government for other purposes may, perhaps, safely conform to the "greenbacks" now in circulation, with the exceptions of the "legal tender" clause, and the gold-interest and gold-payment on duties on imports clauses. The following is the reading of the notes proposed, to take the place of the "greenbacks" now in circulation:—

The United States promise to pay to bearer one dollar. This note is receivable for all debts due the United States.

Nothing should be a "legal tender" between citizens except what was agreed upon by the contracting parties.

If any of the States or municipalities within the United States undertake the ownership and management of any of the enterprises proposed above (which it is no doubt very desirable they should, if they would do it on the cost principle), the money should be furnished by the United States, at cost, on the credit of the State or municipality, in a way similar to that by which it now furnishes national bank notes to each of the two thousand banks in the country, every separate bank having different reading upon its notes; and yet it is a national currency, which every one seems to insist upon having, and circulates without question throughout the country.

The money here proposed would circulate the same, without question, and moreover it would be stable in its character, perfectly reliable, and positively redeemable.

"CHRIST'S SUPERNATURALISM SCIENTIFICALLY CONSIDERED."

Some time ago we took occasion to object to the title of one of Dr. Augustus Blauvelt's articles, "Christ's Miracles Scientifically Considered," in Scribner's Monthly; and we wish to raise the same objection to an article which appears in the February number of the same magazine under the title forming the heading of this communication.

Dr. Blauvelt, in a remarkable series of articles on "Modern Scepticism," labored to show that there was a tidal wave of unbelief and doubt sweeping onward to our shores from the transatlantic Christian countries, which the bulwarks of Orthodoxy must be strengthened to meet. He showed very conclusively that this intellectual wave of doubt and unbelief was very different from those that formerly surged around the Church, and that, being different, it required different means of defence. He showed by numerous and candid quotations from the works of modern thinkers, that modern scepticism was allied with modern science,—that is to say, that the natural is opposed to the supernatural; that to withstand the attacks of this coalition the old methods of defence were useless; and that it therefore became necessary to decide upon a change which should meet the new requirements of the case. This Dr. Blauvelt finds to be, after viewing the subject from every stand-point, the necessity of placing Christianity upon the same foundation as that of ordinary science. Nor does he use the word science in any equivocal manner, for he quotes from Huxley to show what scientific men consider necessary to be done in order to make theological views acceptable to them; and Huxley is not the man to entertain or give expression to any equivocal sentiments as to what scientific conditions are. When, therefore, Dr. Blauvelt heads his article with the quotation from the above-named distinguished thinker, "If any one is able to make good the assertion that his theology rests upon valid evidence and sound reasoning, then it appears to me that such theology will take its place as a part of science," we have a right to infer that the method of proof to be advanced to establish "Christ's supernaturalism" will be such as would be accepted not only by Huxley, but by all scientific thinkers. But in this, we are free to say, there will be disappointment, unless the absolute impossibility of putting any supernaturalism upon a strict scientific basis should have made one wholly incredulous.

The "scientific examination" of Christ's supernaturalism, according to Dr. Blauvelt, consists in a critical examination of the works of Paulus, Renan, and Strauss, making the statement of one contradict that of another. As if conscious that this process will be called in question, he says, in effect, that their works are the only scientific attempts to disprove the supernaturalism of Christ, and, he should have added, the disclosing of the failure of these attempts proves Christ's supernaturalism!

Now in our opinion it does nothing of the kind. It simply shows, assuming the correctness of his analysis, that in attempting to solve a puzzle these men have failed. The puzzle itself remains entirely unchanged by the attempts. The only thing that is proven is that, if the puzzle is solvable at all, it must be by some other method than that pursued by these writers. To call an analysis of Robert Dale Owen's Debatable Land a scientific examination of Spiritualism is just as reasonable as to call an analysis of the works of Paulus, Renan, or Strauss, a scientific examination of Christ's supernaturalism!

A scientific examination, properly so called, of what is claimed to be supernaturalism, can only take place under conditions common to all scientific investigations. Chief of these conditions is freedom of observation. Hence we must have either a repetition of phenomena, or such a continuance of them as will supply the place of repetition. Moreover, observation must be enlarged and strengthened by experiment, and experiment necessitates tests. These tests, in the case of supernaturalism, must be such as, applied to natural bodies, always produce uniform effects, and which, applied to supernatural bodies, should produce opposite effects; or, at least, the natural effects should be wanting.

It is evident that, in the case of Christ's supernaturalism, true scientific inquiry is barred; for it is impossible to produce those conditions on which such inquiry depends. Hence, the futility of such inquiry being foreseen, no scientific man of the present day attempts either its proof or disproof.

The question, therefore, not being susceptible of scientific proof, must depend for its solution upon its reasonableness; that is to say, upon its harmony or want of harmony with our experiences. Now the scientific man is, of all men, the one most familiar with natural things. That every effect is the result of a cause, and that certain conditions will produce certain results, is what is continually impressed upon his mind. To this conception he gives the name of law, and so firmly does this orderly arrangement, this action and interaction of the forces of Nature, imprint itself upon his mind that to conceive of a deviation therefrom is for him well-nigh impossible. Hence, he knows that if he believes in the supernaturalism of Christ he does so in opposition to the teachings of his experience; that experience has been mainly scientific, therefore his belief in Christ's supernaturalism is in opposition to scientific deductions, and consequently must be founded upon something apart from science, and that something is called faith.

It is here, we think, the great error of Dr. Blauvelt lies. He has picked up the gauntlet thrown down by a sceptic, and, in attempting to put supernaturalism upon a natural basis, is attempting an impossibility. Christ's supernaturalism rests upon his divine nature, and his divine nature upon his miraculous conception. To put his supernaturalism upon a scientific basis necessitates the putting of a miracle upon the same foundation. A miracle ceases to be a miracle when it is explained scientifically; that is to say, when the conditions under which it occurs are made known. And moreover, if it were possible to put the fundamental principles of Christianity upon a strictly scientific basis, as Dr. Blauvelt claims, such procedure would be subversive of that faith which the Church has taught in all ages, and which has always been considered the very corner-stone of the structure.

PIETY VS. SANITY.

NEW YORK, Feb. 11, 1875.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I learned a curious lesson a day or two ago which I must tell you. Some forty years or more since, there was married in the State of Rhode Island a couple of young persons whose piety was very sincere and earnest. They sympathized in their opinions with the famous Charles Finney, of Oberlin, who at that time was one of the perfectionists—a class who, I believe, think that their attitude to God is such that he imputes no sin to them. During many years they tried to live close to God and do no wrong, and I have no doubt but they succeeded as well as people generally do who try to change the order of Nature. Their religious emotions at any rate were said to be very ardent, and they rejoiced in what is called "full salvation."

Now during these years a child was born, who is even more religious than her parents—for she believes that she talks with God as of old, and that God tells her his will, and she follows it in all things. She thinks she is free from sin, born again, and that she shall never die. She believes she is to found a new religion, and that her followers will be immortal. She believes that she will soon be able to cure the sick by her touch as Christ did—or as it is said he did. She is a poor woman, strong in body and sensible on other subjects, works hard at her calling, and thinks herself a martyr. She has inherited from her parents a nervous system that is insane past all cure.

There is a lesson to be learned from this; and that is that the wild emotions of many pious people breed disorders of the mind in the offspring. For that reason very pious people ought not to bear children. They are almost certain to curse them with an insane diathesis.

Truly, M. L. H.

WHILE Franklin, at Paris, was negotiating for peace between the United States and Great Britain, he was one day dining with the British Commissioners when the conversation turned upon the subject of fables. One of the British Commissioners expressed his belief that Æsop had exhausted the subject—that no man could make a new fable. Dr. Franklin thought otherwise. He was challenged to produce one. At the next meeting, on a similar occasion, he did so. "An eagle," he said, "hovering over a farm, saw what he supposed to be a hare. Swooping down, he carried the animal up in his talons. He had mistaken a cat for a hare. Puss made the eagle's feathers fly so lively that the bird was glad to drop his prey."

"Moral: England should have been more careful. She mistook the cat—America—for a hare."

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
 Yours truly,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
 PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.HORTICULTURAL HALL*LECTURES*FOR 1875.

The Committee of the Free Religious Association, in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons, again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below,—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged:—

REASONS FOR USING THEEUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

CONCERNING AMERICA.

By CHARLES SUMNER.

Aside from its literary and historical merits, this volume has a special interest, from the fact that it was the last work on which Mr. Sumner was engaged before his death.

"PROPHETIC VOICES" will be found of great value to all who take an interest in the history of our country, so full is it of passages in which the unexampled prosperity of our land has been foretold by philosophers, poets, statesmen, and orators, of whom the lamented author has also given interesting sketches.

SEEDS AND PLANTS.

The Catalogues of Seeds and Plants for 1875 of Peter Henderson & Co., 35 Cortlandt St., New York, are just received. They number about 180 pages, are finely illustrated, and in addition contain 5 beautiful colored plates of the following:—

A Group of Roses.
Verbenas.
Pinks.
Lobellias.
And a New Vegetable.

These Catalogues, with all the plates, are mailed to all applicants by Peter Henderson & Co., on receipt of 50 cents. Also, to all purchasers of their books, "Gardening for Profit" and "Practical Floriculture" (the cost of which is $1.50 each, prepaid by mail), they will annually send plain copies without charge.

RADICAL LECTURES.

Having recently left the Church for the sake of freedom and truth, I am now ready to lecture on

LIBERAL SUBJECTS

to liberal people. I will speak on—

1. THE RELATION OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION.
2. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.
3. THE ANTAGONISM OF CHRISTIANITY TO CIVILIZATION.
4. THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

Other lectures also on interesting subjects.

I am willing to go West, if an engagement can be made for a sufficient number of lectures to make it an inducement; and to settle with any liberal society on terms mutually satisfactory.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF _____.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in:—

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

For List of Liberal Leagues, see next page.

GLIMPSES.

THE ITALIAN government, it is stated, has realized about $98,000,000 within the last eight years from the auction-sale of confiscated Church property.

THE GRAND old hero, Garibaldi, has taken the oath of allegiance to the Italian government. The story of his visit to Rome, as told in the Independent, is of thrilling interest.

A COURSE of Sunday Evening Lectures has begun at Cotton Hall, in this city, on Labor Reform and allied topics. General H. K. Oliver lectured last Sunday on "A Brief History of Labor, with Hints towards Remedying its Ills."

THE JESUITS have got complete control of the republic of Ecuador, which has been officially, with great solemnity, put under the protection of the "Sacred Heart of Jesus." Every officer and soldier of the army is sworn to defend the "Holy Roman Catholic Church." And Rome hopes yet to annex the United States to her dominions.

THE Christian Union of February 24 says: "Friends of the compulsory system of education will find a powerful argument in the fact that, in New York City, where there are about as few genuine causes of absenteeism as anywhere, the registered pupils number more than a quarter of a million, while the regular attendants are not half so many."

AT THE Paine Hall Dedication, Mr. G. L. Henderson told this noble anecdote of Thomas Paine, which we do not remember ever to have heard before: "When a friend of Thomas Paine (and he was a wise man, too) said to him, when he proposed to leave this country and take part in the great struggle for liberty in France, 'You have done enough; remain quietly here and rest under the laurels you have earned; for,' said he, 'where liberty is, that is my country.' Thomas Paine replied, 'Where liberty is not, there is my country.'"

PROFESSOR DENTON writes to us to say that the letter in which he declined to take part in the services at the dedication of Paine Hall was not published entire in the Investigator; that it was not bad theories, but bad practices, that he gave as the objections in his own mind against one of the speakers announced, and that this part of his letter was not printed. This explanation should be made in justice to Professor Denton; and we think that either his reasons should have been given in full or else that the matter should not have been referred to at all.

THERE is something exquisitely touching in the alacrity with which Mr. E. H. Heywood, editor of the Princeton, Mass., Word, chants requiems over our corpse. We have been massacred by every one who rides Mr. Heywood's own favorite hobbies. Now we have not the least objection to being dead, if that will accommodate the gentleman; but if he will stop scalping our prostrate form and suspend his war-dance just long enough to answer the arguments he has not yet ventured to meddle with, the ghost of the late editor of THE INDEX will never interrupt him again.

THE BENIGHTED condition of almost the entire South, in all that pertains to religious liberty, is startlingly illustrated by the following telegraphic despatch of the Associated Press: "Raleigh, February 25. The House of Representatives considered in three night-sessions a resolution for the expulsion of J. William Gray, from William County, on account of his non-belief in the existence of a God, as set forth in a pamphlet issued by him. The vote on it at midnight last night was—yeas 46; nays, 31." And this is the year 1875! For such violations of the freedom of thought and speech there is no practical remedy but the "Religious Freedom Amendment."

THIS CLIPPING is from the Boston Commonwealth: "Mr. S. H. Morse is rapidly rising to a very creditable place as a modeller. He has lately finished a life-size head of Theodore Parker, which is a great improvement on his two-thirds size, and gives general satisfaction." A portrait bust of Thomas Paine shows a man of large features and cheerful face, in which benevolence, love of ease, and cynicism, are betrayed—one who might go swinging through the world, caring little for opinions or potentes. A head of Mr. Chace, of Valley Falls, R. I., is very happy in its representation of dignity combined with kindness. It is admirably draped in Quaker garb. A full-length of a child, the son of Rev. J. Vila Blake, formerly of this city, now of New York, is very sweet and expressive. The modelling seems perfect."

OUR THANKS are due to Mr. George Hess, the well-known sculptor of New York, for his superb busts of David Friedrich Strauss and Ludwig Feuerbach. They are executed with great skill in plaster, and will nobly adorn a free-thinker's library or study. Feuerbach has a head like one of the old Greek philosophers, with a long beard and an expression of great boldness, force, and subtlety of thought. But Strauss fascinates us completely. His face is smooth-shaven, with lines of character and intellect that marvellously appeal to the sympathies and the imagination. A gentle melancholy is shadowed about the firm mouth and chin, and remind one almost painfully of the relentless persecution that he was called to endure so long; while the fine eye and grand forehead tell of the integrity, pride, and valor of soul that made Strauss—

"One of the few, immortal names
That were not born to die."

It is a face to gaze at long and reverently, for it is the face of a scholar, thinker, hero. The two busts together are monuments of the best German mind of the nineteenth century, and will stimulate the highest life of him who is capable of appreciating the grandeur of the men they bring so vividly to view. Mr. Hess is to be congratulated on his remarkable success. The price is five dollars apiece; and the busts may be obtained either of the sculptor himself at 71 Amity Street, New York city, or of Schönhof & Möller, 40 Winter Street, Boston.

FROM A LETTER just received from an English gentleman writing at Biarritz, France, we venture to make the following highly interesting extracts: "We have here magnificent waves breaking all day long, bringing 'the eternal note of sadness in' from the Atlantic. It is pleasant to think, however, of the ideas which are gradually kindling on the other side of this huge water by means of the noble INDEX. We have no such organ in England: religious radicalism does not stand so high with us as with you. You overrate Tyndall; whatever he may be as a man of science, he quibbles upon the religious question—fears the world, in fact. John Morley, editor of the Fortnightly Review, is by far the noblest presence among us. Herbert Spencer has degenerated into a dogmatic fatalist, and has just been well handled by Professor Cairnes (a Mill political-economist) in the Fortnightly Review. I am sure you do not see the Fortnightly: it is the highest, indeed our only, intellectual radical organ in England. I will write and request the publishers to forward you the last and present number: let me call your particular attention to Morley's article on 'Diderot,' and to his article in the January number on Mill's religious essays, also to Cairnes on Spencer. Spencer has dug up an old passage of his to show that his doctrine is not one of fatalism and passivity in public affairs. But the Herbert Spencer, author of Social Statics, and the Herbert Spencer, author of the Sociology, are mentally two very different people."

The Spirit of Truth, the Comforter.

A SERMON IN LYRIC HALL, NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 27, 1874.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

By the spirit of truth I mean the truthful spirit. That the writer of the fourth gospel would have given this definition of it is not affirmed. So far as I can discover, he regarded the spirit of truth as a conscious being, a superintending, directing mind, whose office would consist in watching over the spiritual interests of the Christian community after the Christ had left the earth and ascended to the Father. Nothing, perhaps, was further from his thought than the idea that the spirit of truth was simply a disposition of the human mind, that might be present in any age of the world and do its work for men of all opinions. To him it was one element of the new dispensation, and came into prominence as a power to sustain it and carry it on; and thus the Christian Church regards it at this day, whether Greek, Roman, English, or German. The spirit of truth, so teaches the creed, is the third person of the Trinity conveying Christian truth. We, however, take the liberty of interpreting the phrase strictly according to its literal meaning. The spirit of truth is neither more nor less nor other than the truthful spirit; the temper that loves the truth for its own dear or sacred sake—desires it for itself alone, apart from its rewards or advantages—seeks it through difficulties and obstacles, and clings to it, when discovered, in spite of the hardships and sorrows that allegiance brings with it. The spirit of truth is opposed to the spirit of prejudice, which holds the mind back; the spirit of dogmatism, which keeps it stationary; the spirit of partisanship, which uses truth for selfish ends; the spirit of conceit, which makes a flourishing display of truth; the spirit of fear, which dreads possible disclosures of truth. It is a simple, ingenuous, trusting, sincere spirit, which is akin to charity, in that it is ready to believe all things, endure all things, hope all things. Indeed, the very essence of it is the feeling of charity to all the world, a disposition to believe that, in proportion as it is understood, the universe will be found not to lie; a disposition to hope that each fresh discovery in the order of things will throw out some new promise of good.

It is a common persuasion that the love of truth is a very rare quality, that the people who boast of it mistake a very different thing for it. What they choose to call the love of truth is the love of power, or the love of their own creed; and so in any individual instance it may be. When we regard the special teacher, reformer, sage, philosopher, theologian, divine, preacher, and ask ourselves if he, the particular man, can be credited with a love of the truth pure and simple, we usually, if not invariably, discover reasons for misgiving. But as one considers mankind in mass, as one looks over the history of the human mind, it is difficult to believe that error has ever to any great extent been attractive, or that anything less mighty than a passion to know the sincere truth about matters of moment has actuated the multitudes who have constructed so many schemes, one after another, and have left them to perish. The disposition to find the truth is so widespread and so obvious that it is hardly too much to say that man has an instinct for truth, which keeps him continually in quest of it, and points him in the direction where it lies; an instinct like that which guides the animal towards the spring of water; an instinct like that of hunger and thirst, not subtle enough to detect noxious elements in food or drink, not infallible, but keen enough to save from fatal errors. The appetite of hunger puts animals in quest of food, but does not, except in very decided cases, guard them against unwholesome ingredients or adulterations in food. So the appetite for truth puts men in quest of truth, but does not enable them to discriminate between truth and error. Truth-loving men are found passionately clinging to beliefs which have been discovered to have no ground in fact, no correspondence with the nature of things; but they do not perceive this. To them the beliefs represent things just as they are.

That the spirit of truth is as old as the human mind, and has been active from the beginning, is evident by every decisive sign. It is attested by the history of art, which is man's effort to discover truth in the form of beauty. It is attested by the history of science, which is man's effort to discover truth in the form of fact. It is attested by the history of philosophy, which is man's effort to discover truth in the form of reason. It is attested by the history of theology, which is man's effort to discover the ultimate truth of causes. By all these methods the love of truth has declared itself. The religious creeds of mankind, even the most strange, outlandish, and barbarous—nay, the latter more especially—illustrate its power. The bright beliefs in a Father of the world, a paternal providence, guardian angels, a happy immortality, might possibly be ascribed to a less noble origin. The temptation to accept them because they are pleasant will, in many cases, explain the fervor with which they are held. The love of ease and sweetness will account for their popularity. No deep earnestness is required of people who saunter through a delicious garden, plucking the fairest flowers and gathering the most luscious fruits. One need not be a devoted naturalist to do that. The devoted naturalist shows his passion for truth by hunting a thick forest in hope to find a new flower, or risking life in search of a rare specimen of bird or fish.

The ugly beliefs of men—the shocking, disgusting, revolting beliefs—the beliefs that bear the bad name of superstitions—these put to the test the power of the spirit of truth in mankind: a belief like that in the divine election, as held by the old Calvinists; the doctrine of infant damnation, as entertained by sincere Presbyterians in the earliest times, when they followed their first principles out to their logical results; the doctrine of endless punishment by fire, as professed unflinchingly by consistent Evangelical Christians even now. As I read accounts of these tenets, by many regarded as diabolical, and consider the intensity of conviction with which they have been cherished (for that is not too strong a word), I am touched with a tender respect for the minds that rested in them. For what power less imperative than the spirit of truth, seeking the truth through all difficulties, clinging to it at all hazards, entertaining it at all costs, reposing on it as if the bed of coals were a couch of flowers, could have prevented people from breaking away with horror from dogmas that must have struck like poisoned darts to their souls? Unless their nature was radically different from ours, such beliefs could not have been agreeable to them; they could not have been other than painful; yet their sincerity in avowing them is not to be questioned. They must have professed them because they held them to be true, the best truth there was—the only truth, in fact, that could be arrived at. That staggering doctrine of election represented an apparent fact in the economy of providence; the doctrine of the damnation of unbaptized infants followed inevitably from the essential depravity of human nature, which was the fundamental article in their religious system. The doctrine of eternal punishment expressed their shuddering conviction of the divine holiness. From these first principles they could not get away, however they might wish to; and so they stayed where their search landed them, comforting themselves with the assurance that if their beliefs were uncongenial with their natural feelings they were, at least, true. The doctrine of evolution in Nature supposes an effort on the part of the creative power to reach perfect through imperfect states; and the honesty of the effort is shown in the courage with which horrid forms of snake, alligator, and panther were accepted as stages of advance. So in the evolution of the mind, the spirit of truth displays its power in the fidelity with which it accepts hideous forms of belief that are necessary as steps towards knowledge.

I have said that the believers in the grimmest faiths found comfort in them. The spirit of truth was to them a comforter—that is, a strengthener, an invigorator, for that is the meaning of the word. This assertion will probably be more startling than the other, that the dogmas referred to owed their origin to the spirit of truth, and not to the spirit of error. The common impression is with us that the ages when the Calvinistic system prevailed were ages of gloomy fear, that earnest believers were very wretched in their beliefs, as we imagine that we should have been had we stood in their place. But there is no satisfactory evidence that it was so. They were indeed braced up with a tremendous tension, strung to the highest pitch; but with all this came a strange joy and an equally strange peace in the feeling that what they held was the very truth of God. They sang none but spiritual songs, but they sang. They had comfort: not exactly what people usually understand by comfort,—soothing rest, the peace of quiescent thought,—but the common fortitude which contact with strong natures imparts. It is a curious fact that the mind maintained its tranquil serenity in the earnest ages, in the very midst of the most horrible suggestions. A popular writer calls attention to the fact that the Christian art in the Roman Catacombs is sweet and trustful. "The very altar tomb around which the Christian painter scattered his ornaments with most profusion was often associated with the memory of sufferings of the most horrible and varied character. Passions, too, were roused to the highest point. Yet nothing of this appears in the Catacombs. There was no disposition to perpetuate forms of suffering, no ebullition of bitterness or complaint, no thirsting for vengeance. The wreaths of flowers in which paganism delighted, and even some of the most joyous images of the pagan mythology, were still retained, and were mingled with all the most beautiful emblems of Christian hope, and with representations of many of the miracles of mercy."

When Thomas Aquinas said that the bliss of the saved would be enhanced by contemplation of the woes of the damned, he was not conscious of saying either a barbarous or a foolish thing. Jonathan Edwards, one of the purest, sweetest, saintliest men that ever lived, said the same thing, in the utmost sincerity. His sermon, "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," is said to have started hearers from their seats in dismay, and set them staring with white faces at the calm preacher who could, unmoved himself, proclaim such frightful message. The preacher was calm, for he was contemplating not the agony of the writhing sinners, but the vindication of the divine justice. In this contemplation he had an awful joy, that made him insensible to the more ghastly accompaniments of the victory. It was "the glory of the coming of the Lord" that enchanted him. The story has become hackneyed of the good woman who was horrified at Universalism because it deprived her of her last comfort, the belief that the wicked were all at last to be consumed. "Cannot you grant us something?" she exclaimed. "Cannot you allow us, say, five thousand years?" There is a profound peace in the persuasion that one has the truth, however unpalatable the truth may be. For the truth stands on everlasting foundations. I am anxious to vindicate man from the frightful charge of wilfully believing in error. I am anxious to recover confidence in the majesty of the human mind, to beget a faith that, on the whole, men have done their best, and in doing their best have found peace, albeit a peace that passeth understanding. If it were possible to look into the secret heart of that poor woman, one might find there, unexpressed and inexpressible, the same thought that filled the minds of Aquinas and Edwards. She too, dumb, opaque soul, was feeling, perhaps, that the belief in universal salvation and bliss was fatal to the eternal righteousness on which she rested her frail heart. If at last all are to fare alike on the other side of death, why not all alike on this side? And then what becomes of the distinction between good and evil? Where is the room left for display of justice? Is not the very quality of righteousness abolished? She was possibly thinking of some unkindly neighbor whom she thought a fit subject for the sulphur; but she may have thought of God, whose reputation for integrity was more precious, in her opinion, than any gossip's overthrow.

But the spirit of truth is never stationary, nor can be, so long as the truth remains undiscovered. The spirit of truth shall guide you into all truth, said the Evangelist, implying that the truth was very far off, though the Christ had departed, and the Scripture was closed. How far off he little suspected. We, who are two thousand years older than he, are beginning to think it will never be found. There is talk of the unknown and unknowable, and intimations are frequent that the spirit of truth means to keep us forever on the march, and never allow us again to have an abiding-place. Will it be any the less a comforter, then, if it does? It is a very noble and a very large confession that the loving search for truth is more exhilarating than its possession. They told me at Niagara last summer that Professor Tyndall, eager to explore the inmost secret of the falls, asked for the boldest guide, and wanted to press behind the great cataract. It was a fearful venture; at every step he risked his life; at one instant his destruction seemed inevitable, as the slipping of his foot precipitated him into the water; but at no moment would the enthusiastic naturalist have confessed himself dismayed. Danger was to him inducement. He never thought of the danger, only of the extension of knowledge he expected to gain. What joy he must have among the glaciers of the Alps, far away from human habitation, studying the effects of light and heat in the bleak spaces which men dare not explore! A distinguished woman, whose life was one of sorrows, wrote a book to which she gave the title, A Year of Consolation. It was a book of travel. The months were spent in foreign cities, among the memorials of the Old World and the people of the New, observing strange customs, trying various climates, watching many skies, cutting adrift from the monotony of home, and letting the great world crowd in and entertain her. It is the fashion to pity the wanderers who, in search of knowledge, make themselves pilgrims on the face of the earth. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews paints a sad picture of the ancient worthies of his nation going forth in search of a country and dying, only bequeathing their quest to their successors—Abraham and Moses and the rest wandering in desert places, hoping to find the country that ever vanished before them in the distance. And yet if we could have looked into their hearts we should have found them full of consolation. Abraham's experience of wonders began after he had left his home in obedience to the impulse to seek a new country. Then, according to the legends, the meanings of Providence were opened to him: cities offered him hospitality, kings gave him welcome, priests bestowed on him blessing, angels visited him in the evening. If the story of Moses' wandering in the desert could have been written truthfully, it would be found a story of incessant surprises—the sandy wastes, the blistering rocks, the fiery skies, the oases, the palm-trees, the shadowy mountains, the mysterious resources of water and food, revealing to him the wealth of the world he lived in. Day by day his mind expanded; day by day his heart enlarged; day by day his conceptions of God and of destiny swelled out to nobler proportions. It may have been the happiest part of his long life, a portion so happy that the refusal of permission to enter the promised land was no wrong. Did Columbus have no consolation in his weary course of application from court to court, in the consciousness that the spirit of truth was in his breast? The hope of opening Africa to civilization and extinguishing forever the slave-trade kept the heart of David Livingstone young among the savage tribes of Africa. Had he returned alive, how dull and stupid London would have seemed to him, with its close cathedrals, its narrow streets, its dark skies! The exhilaration of searching for new truth is so great that the new truth always disappoints when found. Nothing less than the eternity which is entered by the gateway of death will satisfy those who have looked with single mind after truth. The awakened traveller is glad to get home, and live outside of his trunk once more; but his home does not content him. It must be refurnished. There must be art on the walls, beauty in the decorations, delicacy in the kitchen; a larger world must find accommodation there. The rooms must be architecturally proportioned in order to satisfy the wider culture of their occupants. It is incessant going forth, renewed and repeated wandering, that freshens existence; and this is quite as true in the intellectual as in the social and domestic sphere.

But the spirit of truth is exacting. We weary in following it. It gives to life something like a vagrant character. The desire for some fixed habitation gets the better of curiosity, and people settle down at way-stations and flatter themselves that they have reached the end. St. Paul did, Luther did, Calvin did, the English Reformers did, the Unitarians did and do; when the spirit of truth flags, the traveller stops and puts up his shanty, which in time becomes a cluster of shanties. But when the spirit of truth dies the comforter disappears. The spirit of unrest is born. The placid believer is devoured by ennui. The comforter is, I believe, to-day more active outside of Christendom than in. Every church is troubled; every sect is rent in twain by divisions; every creed is shaken and torn with disbeliefs. Controversy has intruded into every communion; and often, where the bond of fellowship seems closest, the interior discord is wildest. Running water alone is living. The standing pool becomes stagnant, breeds noxious insects, and engenders malaria. How healthful the atmosphere in which the best class of scientific men live! How free their minds are from vapors! They have no misgivings. Their hearts know no fear. Though they are always on the march, though their minds have no abiding habitation, and their hopes reach forward to none, still they have an abounding elasticity. Every day brings its joy. The religious world is deeply agitated by Professor Tyndall's address at Glasgow. But why, except that it palpitates all through with the glad spirit of discovery? Tyndall announces no creed, lays down no limit, suggests no terminus, dictates no law, throws down no challenge. He simply shows himself fascinated by a method, and builds most glorious structures of anticipation upon its actual achievements. His hand closes no door of inquiry, but merely points to vistas of beauty through the doorway that he has been instrumental in opening. The characteristic of his address is a breezy frankness, a generous confidence in the human mind, an intellectual guilelessness, such as always belong to the honest lover of truth. He has no enemies. He lays no ambush; he bears no ill-will. The theologians charge him with atheism. He is unconscious of any state of mind suggested by that word. They call him materialist; he feels in no way touched, for what matter may be he claims not to know, and what may come out of it he pretends not to declare. He only knows that thus far very glorious and surprising things have come out of it, and it is but fair to look for things more surprising and glorious still. What I like about these men is their sincere, truthful spirit. Their particular opinions may be correct or not. The point to be observed is that they themselves do not assert their correctness in any dogmatic sense, but only throw them out by the way, as floats to indicate the margins of an infinite deep. They themselves do not rest in them, but strain their eyes forward. Even if they are wrong, their buoyant temper will more than redeem their incidental error.

A distinguished preacher of the last generation delivered a powerful sermon on this theme: Which is the more innocent and noble, to hold truth in the spirit of error, or to hold error in the spirit of truth? And the conclusion he came to was that to hold error in the spirit of truth is the more noble and innocent. For the spirit of truth will soon discard or correct the error, while the spirit of error will soon change the truth into a lie. Surely all scientific men have not the spirit of truth; but, as I read and ponder, it seems to me that the spirit of truth is stronger in them than in any other class, and from that spirit everything is to be hoped.

The one thing to be dreaded in the present is the disposition to rest in finalities on any side, in any interest, whether new or old. The inconvenience of the old habit of doing so is acknowledged. The traveller through the newly-settled region of the West is ever and anon perplexed to know the reason why men built their settlements where they did, on low, marshy ground, in close valleys or on inaccessible hills, when, by going a little further or turning a little aside, they might have planted themselves in more wholesome localities. But our amazement is greater that, in their spiritual explorations, men should have planted themselves where they are. What could have induced them to stop in the marsh of total depravity, to build on the edge of a crater called everlasting damnation, or to stake out farms in neighborhoods infested by such wild beasts as predestination, election, and vicarious atonement? In the Arabian Nights there is a story of shipwrecked mariners who, mistaking a whale's back for an island, landed on it, broke up their faithful old boat for fire-wood, and, having kindled a flame, were about to cook their dinner, when a sudden plunge carried them down into the deep. They thought they had escaped. And there, for all men's reading, is Robert Browning's gorgeous poem of "The men who stayed by their first fault, and perished in their pride." Their fleet, freighted with gleaming images of stone, sets out in gallant array towards the happy islands:—

Now one morn land appeared!—a speck
Dim trembling betwixt sea and sky.
Not so the isles our voyage must find
Should meet our longing eye.
But the heaving sea was black behind,
Many a night and many a day.
And land, though but a rock, was nigh.
So we broke the cedar pales away,
And let the purple flap in the wind:
And a statue bright was on every deck!
We shouted, every man of us,
And steered right into the harbor thus,
With pomp and psalm glorious.

But the land was a desolate rock, as they discovered, when the precious freight had been brought on shore, and each costly image "of lucid stone" had been placed in its rocky shrine. Scarcely was their work completed when the gentle islanders from the happy shores they started for, with merry shouts, and songs, and laughter, crowded in throngs to welcome their expected guests.

"Our isles are just at hand," they cried;
"Like cloudlets faint in even sleeping;
Our temple gates are opened wide,
Our olive groves thick shade are keeping
For these majestic forms."
Then we awoke with sudden start
From our deep dream, and knew, too late,
How bare the rock, how desolate,
Which had received our precious freight.
Yet we called out—"Depart!
Our gifts, once given, must here abide;
Our work is done; we have no heart
To mar our work," we cried.

Yet this old error is again and again repeated. The longing is for a stopping-place, a conclusion, a terminus, a rock on which to embark, which languor mistakes for the rock of ages. The rationalist falls into the same delusion for which he chides or ridicules the dogmatist. He complains of the endless road; he murmurs at being kept continually on the march, and is ready to claim that he has found the holy city. One plants himself on theism as the ultimate goal, beyond which it is unsafe to explore. A personal God, creator, guide, inspirer, providence, hearer of prayer, is his soul's dwelling-place. Give me this, he cries, and all else may go. He is unwilling to see that theism is full of provoking suggestions that start thought out in new directions, and compel a resumption of the staff and knapsack. Others, discouraged by the difficulties that beset these new paths, give over all quest after the Supreme Mind, and doggedly make their home in atheism, call theism a superstition like all the rest, less coarse, but therefore more deceptive, and insist on writing "vacancy" over the vast tract where intellect has felt that it mingled with the reason whereof it was a spark; forgetting, these atheists, that thought is by its nature infinite; that it will not be bounded by negations, but must, from the necessity of its being, people with thoughts countless and divine the spaces that oppress its imagination. Atheism cannot be a finality with any truth-loving mind; for truth is not a negation. The spirit of truth cannot lead to denial. Atheism is but a shadowy vapor of mind, through which thought presses, chilled, into the sunlight. The spirit that is content to dwell in shadow is not the spirit of truth. How impossible it is for materialism to be a finality is seen in Tyndall's ascription to matter of divine potencies which transform the old, crude substances, we have always called material, into powers charged with the fullness of creative energy.

The spirit of truth will not let its devotee stop longer than is needed to refresh his vigor. Every station is a way-station. There seem to be not a few who, having reached a satisfactory conviction in regard to a personal immortality, build on that foundation as if they were erecting the final city of habitation. The attractiveness of the stopping-place is not to be questioned. The scenery is enchanting; the atmosphere delicious; the outlook in all directions lovely. But the eager mind, thirsting for the living waters, standing on the elevation of the natural fact of continued existence, gazes out beyond, and discerns tempting prospects. Questions come up faster than they can be answered. What is implied in this new existence? Where is it to end? Is existence a succession of deaths and births? To what purpose these changes and alterations? What constitutes the substance of the being that is thus perpetually transformed? The new position taken up on the other side of the grave becomes thus a fresh starting-point; not a terminus, but a new centre of departure.

But if the ordinary, unreflecting Spiritualist is unwise in calling his tent a castle, how unwise must his antagonist be who refuses even to pitch a tent, but flouts the idea that beyond the grave there can be any life or love at all! The man who professes to be certain of annihilation, who holds it fixed beyond peradventure that the grave devours mankind utterly, surely dogmatizes prematurely. To say that conscious existence after death is, from the nature of the case, impossible, is saying a good deal more than knowledge or experience justifies. Moments will come to reflecting minds when that foreboding presses like doom. But there are not many minds that do not instinctively recoil from the conclusion, and by a sudden revulsion fling themselves upon the other alternative. The lover of truth is always a truth-seeker, and the truth-seeker must not be a dogmatist; for dogmatism is arrest of mind.

Thus the spirit of truth leads onward. But while it leads it comforts, that is, braces, and strengthens. On the old supposition that the world is a place of exile, and life a banishment, and knowledge sorrow, and wisdom grief, and God a far-off being, holding immortal truth and felicity in reserve for the pilgrims who escape the lions and the pitfalls, by their carefulness in walking, blind-folded, a narrow beaten track,—on this supposition the disciples of truth must forego all hope of comfort as they plod their disconsolate way. But according to the new faith, established by naturalists and scientific philosophers, and now well domesticated among us, that "divine things are not put away into foreign realms of being, and future reaches of time, attainable by no path of toil, no spring of effort, only by miraculous transport, but are met with every day, shining through the substance of life and hid amid its hours,"—the spirit of truth must strew its comforts and consolations all along the way. It makes the way itself a wide and a flowery path, dotted along with resting-places, at which the traveller pauses, not so much to rest his tired frame as to enjoy the prospect. The truth-seeker cannot be heart-sick, cannot be lonely. To be without God in the world is to him impossible. The flowers of Paradise are sleeping in the sod beneath his feet. Though a stone be his pillow, his dreams are heavenly. Walking through the Valley of Baca, he is gladdened by wells of incessant surprise; new suggestions of beauty, new interpretations of phenomena, new hints of truth, new illustrations of goodness, new disclosures of wonder, new effects of light and shadow, meet and arrest him at every turn; his progress must needs be slow, for he cannot dash past the glories that fairly entangle his steps; to glean as he goes along takes time. To exhaust the hours as they pass is more than he can accomplish, and the thronging hours forbid self-complacency. If he faints, it is not from emptiness, but from excess of supply.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

IS PRAYER EFFICACIOUS?

BY BISHOP FERRETTE.

Before entering into this question, I must first state with whom I will not discuss it, and why. I will not discuss it with those who deny the efficacy of prayer on the ground that, as all things are fated to happen in a certain way, prayer, which purports to introduce a change in this necessary concatenation of events, is evidently the most foolish of acts. I will not discuss the question with these, because, according to their principles, it would be the most foolish act on their part to accept any discussion on that subject. If all things are, by a necessity of Nature, fated to happen as they do and will do, prayer which, whether reasonable or foolish, is, as experience convinces us, an event of daily recurrence, will cease or continue to happen according as the fated course of events may necessitate, but irrespective of what I or any one may say. I have no time to waste in haranguing unchangeable laws.

Secondly, I will not discuss the efficacy of prayer with those theologians whom I call the ectheists; that is, those who consider God as holding to the world a relation of transcendence, and having with it no common measure and no univocal predicate. It is impossible better to illustrate the views of this school than by explaining how its Christian branch understands the doctrine of Incarnation. The Incarnation, that is, the union of the eternal Logos or Intellect of God with the human nature in Jesus of Nazareth, is a fact the whole of which took place in the created nature, the divine Logos being absolutely unaffected by it, not only by way of transmutation, but even by way of the slightest impression. The reason is that it is absolutely impossible that God, who is by an eternal necessity immutable, should be affected by anything that comes to pass in time, such as the Incarnation of God in Jesus. The system of which I have given this specimen would evidently require to be carried out, rather than modified, in order to be made to deny the efficacy of prayer, so far as affecting God. Most of its adherents, however, are, logically or not, believers in prayer, and those who are not cannot understand the controversy about prayer without being first enlightened on a previous subject.

Without further enumerating those with whom I will not join issue on this subject in this article, I will now proceed to examine what those should, according to their principles, think of prayer, who believe both in the immanence of God in Nature, and in the principle of liberty as one of the agencies by which the march of events is determined. Those who admit these two principles, while casting off all burden of tradition or magisterial authority, I call free and advanced thinkers. Those who, in presence of the last discoveries of science, still refuse to admit that entheism, that immanence of God in the world, that spirituality and divinity of creation which is the last, and indeed was the first, word of philosophy, appear to me rather belated. On the other hand, I cannot apply the name of free-thinkers to those who begin by denying liberty, and making the world, including man, a machine. They are a branch of the Calvinistic school; Calvinists perhaps of a split ticket, but substantially Calvinists.

To speak first of liberty, its existence being once admitted, the overwhelming amount of it which must exist in the world at once strikes us with awe. To limit the existence of liberty to our planet, or on our planet itself to the human race, is good for those who still make Jerusalem the centre of the world, or explain the enormous deposits of shells in the mountains by the hypothesis that they were inadvertently left by pilgrims, returned from the Holy Sepulchre, in the various places where they sat to take their lunch. The last word of science (if there were such a thing as the last word of science) would be to extend intellect and free will, not only to the animal and plant, but to the ultimate atom, whether in our planet or in the remotest star.

Now liberty, which thus pervades the world not less than electricity, caloric, or attraction, is conceived by us, by a necessity of our nature beyond which we cannot go, first as exempt from necessity, and secondly as accessible to entreaty. This entreatability of free agents is daily exemplified to us in those free agents which proximity of distance and proximity of nature place most immediately within the range of our observations—ourselves, our fellow-men, animals. Whether I entreat a man or an animal to do a certain thing, I have a doubt and a hope that he will do what I pray him to do—a doubt, because I know that he is free, and that my prayer cannot necessitate him to act; a hope, because I know that he is entreatable. The whole of space is full of beings, atomic or collective, which are both free and entreatable to each other, and whose moral life consists chiefly in constantly granting or refusing to one another their mutual requests, under the influences of duty, selfishness, and sympathy.

I have, therefore, I think, established the existence of prayer as one kind of efficacious agency in the determination of the course of events; but then my friend Mr. Frothingham would perhaps say that he does not deny the efficacy of prayer between beings placed within a small distance of each other, provided that the Great All-in-all, though he be not far from any one of us, be excepted from the possibility of being a term of the relation which prayer constitutes. If a great law of Nature be really subject to such an exception, we may rest assured that it is not for any arbitrary reason, such as the insertion in its text, just before its passage, through the sleepiness of the house and the vigilance of an acute lobbyist, of a clause to that effect; and the position of the Great Universal, of which, as such, there is only one, being in this respect at least without parallel, I admit the prima facie reasonableness of a question as to his being affected by prayer as other beings, or otherwise. Perhaps less, and perhaps more; and perhaps—who knows?—not at all. Which of these hypotheses will inquiry come to confirm?

We might be saved the trouble of this inquiry by allowing ourselves to be told that all these matters are unknowable, and that to inquire into them is mere waste of time. That they are knowable, or that they are unknowable, are two big propositions, neither of which it would be scientific to admit a priori. Unless inquiry brings us to their knowledge, we do not know whether they be knowable or not. If they be knowable, we shall know it when we shall know them, and not before. We must be very careful about asserting that we know a thing before we know it; for a moment ago we were sure that we knew that the very notion of prayer was an absurdity contrary to the fundamental laws of the universe; and now it comes to turn out that prayer is one of its most widespread agencies. "For the mere asking" we constantly obtain from our friends "the best things that can be had," their kindness, "mental, moral, spiritual, and social gifts, the averting of physical and moral evil"; and, far from this being "fatally disorganizing to us as individuals or to the community," we find in this gratuitous interchange our noblest means of individual culture,—what gives to social life its highest tone. For the mere asking, we gratuitously obtain analogous blessings from our domestic, and sometimes from wild, animals, from all creatures without other limits than those of our means of reaching them; so that the question now seems to be whether the Great All alone be excluded from the operation of this great law.

If he is excluded from it with regard to prayer, prayer is certainly the only thing in the world by which the Great All can be exempted from being affected. Every other thing affects everything else. There is not an atom in the world that does not exert an attraction on every other atom, in the inverted ratio of the distance, be the terms placed ever so far from each other. There is not a sound, a ray of light, a flash of electricity, a mechanical motion, an act of cerebration, that leaves the world, or any of its parts, exactly as they would have been without it. A fillip that I give in the air has been determined to become a fillip rather than one or two other things by my will; but its quantity as force has existed and shall exist in the world from eternity to eternity. The determination of my will, and of other wills before and after mine, only affects its course,—determines whether it shall become sound, or light, or latent caloric, or chemical affinity,—whether it shall travel from sun to sun and from star to star in this or that direction. This, I am sure, the adversaries of prayer admit; for they are found among advanced thinkers. I will now ask them, do they really mean to say that, for the private convenience of their antipathy to prayer, prayer is the only thing in the world which has not an influence over every part of the universe?

Surely, did I charge them with such an assertion, they would accuse me of a want of fairness. They are too good physicists and metaphysicians to say any such thing. They will readily admit that when a man prays, that prayer, as an act of cerebration or any other fact, will affect the whole universe. What they will deny is that it could affect the universe in the sense which he who prays desires.

What cannot affect the universe in the sense which he who prays desires? His prayer, or his desire? His prayer, of course. The adversaries of prayer are too good physicists and metaphysicians to say that a desire will not influence the universe, in a manner completely or incompletely efficacious, but tending to the fulfilment of the want of which that desire is the expression, or, rather, with which it is identical. A desire, in what we call a person, is a fact analogous to electric, magnetic, or chemical attraction in what we call a thing. When a body is electrified, that is, has the balance of its two electricities destroyed, it desires the one of the two electricities which it lacks, and which is the complement of the one it has; and by lacking or desiring it, it attracts it. A thirsty tree needs, lacks, and desires moisture, and by needing, lacking, and desiring it, it attracts those particles of it which are next at hand, which particles are replaced by those next to them; or, in other words, thirsty vegetation attracts the clouds. A desire in a human soul is, physiologically, a positive or negative electrifying whereby it attracts the object of its desire, which has the opposite electricity. It attracts it, not always with victorious efficiency, because there may be opposite influences, or lack of proportion between the intensity of the attraction and the mass of its object. It is thus that, though the magnetic pole and the magnetic needle always attract and influence each other, they do not necessarily and immediately rejoin each other, because their motion toward each other is opposed by contrary forces too great to be surmounted. Still their action upon each other is not reduced to naught. If their mutual aspirations cannot be directly gratified, they are indirectly so, by acting in deduction of the efficiency of contrary forces. I have no doubt, and I feel sure none of the intelligent adversaries of prayer has any doubt, that every human desire, as a magnetic force, thus attracts its object, whether consciously or not, whether with complete or with incomplete efficiency, whether that object be a person, or a thing, or a phenomenon. If that object is an act of a free agent (I mean free in regard to the particular object of the desire, for no agent is free in all respects), that free agent is influenced so far as to be solicited to determine itself in the desired direction, though he may elect the opposite. The object of the desire being directly influenced, this influence indirectly extends to every other individual being, and thus pervades the Great All.

We have now, by successive eliminations of extraneous matter, reduced the question of prayer to its real terms. The question is not whether prayer necessarily contains elements which, by the very nature of things, must always be efficacious, and that in the sense desired by him who prays. This, as we have shown, must be granted, and the adversaries of prayer will not be so foolish as to contest it. The question is whether, the desire implied in prayer being sure to have its effect, there is any utility in giving to it that particular verbal form, oral or mental, which makes it become what Christians are supposed to understand by the word prayer.

Christians, by prayer, understand no verbiage of any sort. Their views of prayer may be embodied in these words of St. Paul, in which, indeed, they are most frequently expressed: "Be not worried about anything; but in everything, by prayer and beseeching with thanksgiving, be your requests made known unto God."

That our requests are known to God is only another expression of the truth which I have demonstrated, that our desires affect the universe, and of course the Spirit immanent in it. To make them known to God, it is sufficient to have them; but that would not be sufficient to make them a prayer. What makes them a prayer is not the fact of our being, with regard to them, in communication with God, but our consciousness of that fact, a true fact, instinctively known to a properly constituted religious mind, and demonstrable to a properly constituted intellect.

SHOULD WE COMPLAIN?

It was in Dover that Mr. Abbot may be said to have begun his anti-Christian exploits. It was here that he attempted to capture a church, to cheat the members out of all hope of eternal life, and to betray the organization into the hands of a half dozen of his disciples. It was here, also, that he did his level best in all conceivable ways to put contempt upon the idea of a God, to ridicule Christianity, and to put its professors on the level of deluded fanatics.

It makes but little difference, in a practical view of the case, that he was most signally rebuked by the church that he attempted to betray, whose present pastor is a thorough Christian gentleman, held in high esteem by all who share his acquaintance; nor that he was beaten both in the courts and before the bar of public opinion. The fact remains that he sowed seed here which is still struggling for life. Among a few people of a certain class and character he still has his followers. Several young persons, who were then brought under his influence, are growing up to repeat his words, minus that intellectual force, to be sure, which mainly enabled him to make his way, but with such degree of self-assurance and untaught wisdom as they may command.

We have overstated the case in Mr. Abbot's favor, if anything. We were reminded to refer to the matter at all by certain developments of the last fortnight. The churches in Dover united in union meetings during the week of prayer, which have been kept up to the present time. They had not been long in operation before certain tracts began to be distributed in the shops and stores, setting forth that Christianity is a humbug, that Christians are deluded, and that the only respectable thing to do was to keep away from these meetings, and to labor for an anti-Christian amendment to the Constitution.

We are not sure but these methods of our anti-Christian friends ought to be commended. Certainly, if they ever overcome the force of Christ's life and teaching they can't begin their work too soon. Just see what is before them. Here is all of America to be infidelized, besides all of Europe, the isles of the seas, and the greater portions of Asia, Africa, and the other hitherto heathen countries. It is an enormous task for a handful of persons, and they nowise noted for the possession of apostolic qualities. The odds are immensely against them. Besides, there is the divine declaration, yet to be disproved, that it is only fools who deny a God, and it must be confessed that the world has not heretofore shown any encouraging readiness to follow the teaching of that class of persons.

Take, for instance, the case before us. Having failed in Dover, Mr. Abbot went to Toledo, Ohio, where he gathered a "Society," and set himself to accomplish the speedy redemption of the West. But he soon saw fit to leave Toledo, also, and certainly the fame or influence of his Society has not yet spread very far beyond the Maumee swamps. His mission in Boston seems to be not yet accomplished. At any rate, he still remains in that city, and the Orthodox churches keep up their regular services. And then there is Mr. Wasson, and Mr. Higginson, and Mr. Alger, and Mr. Frothingham, and more besides than we have room to mention, who sometime ago set themselves about this very work of snubbing Christianity, but who not only failed to carry their own churches with them, but who, outside of their literary admirers, who are justly found mainly within the churches, have no followers to speak of.

What we sat down to ask is, whether there is any occasion to be disturbed either by the methods of these mighty men of mind, or by the aspects of their cause, or by its prospects. We have heard no one complain of their tract-distribution here in Dover. There is a comfortable belief that one saint, five minutes in prayer, is mightier than a month of such work. Every century, even every period of fifty and twenty-five years during the last thousand, has only shown the world better reasons for accepting the authority of inspiration, and convinced it that its only hope is in and through the divine Christ. His enemies keep coming to defeat, and his life and teachings to renewed glory. So the churches keep quietly about their business, confident of victory through the Lord of Hosts.

This seems to be the best way of meeting these efforts to discredit the Christian faith. To ignore them would be folly. To complain of them, as though their agents took an unfair advantage, would not honor the spirit of religious liberty. To directly quarrel with and oppose them would be exalting them unduly. But to redouble Christian activity and diligence, to show forth His glory by holy living, to simply keep to one's business as a Christian, whether in the line of politics, or preaching, or teaching, or commerce, or what not that is honorable or can be made honorable by thus engaging in it,—this is the sure way to "overcome the world," and to show now much mightier are they that are for Christ than they that are against him.—Morning Star, Dover, N. H., Feb. 24, 1875.

DAWN VALCOUR COMMUNITY.

It has become necessary to inform the public, without further delay, of the fraud attempted to be committed by Orrin Shipman upon the reformers and progressive men and women of this country. By various deceptions Mr. Shipman has been enabled to keep the present members of Dawn Valcour Community, and the public in general, in blindness in regard to the real value of the property offered to the community as a basis for this organization. But now that the true state of affairs is known, it would be unjust or cruel not to publish it to the world, that none may be betrayed into loss of their homes, and their property sunk beyond recovery.

It will be necessary to detail but few of the facts of this affair. Mr. Shipman represented to the members, and to the world, that he was the owner of property, worth fabulous prices, that he would give to a community, providing the community would pay him $31,000; his debts were to be paid and to be deducted from this amount, and the balance paid him in annual instalments. Mr. Shipman usually called his property worth $250,000, but sanctioned the use of his name to a circular that its value to a community was $100,000, and therefore gave what is called a gratuity to the community of $76,000. On a full investigation of the property, by information from the former owners and neighbors immediately adjoining it, the home farm which he calls "Champlain Valley Nurseries," is estimated as worth not over $5,000. For the Valcour Island property Shipman paid $7,600 (paying a profit to the former owner of $1,700). The whole property has decreased in value to a considerable amount, and Mr. Shipman has already offered to give up the property to the mortgagee with what little he has paid upon it, if this spring does not find him flush with community money. This shows that Mr. Shipman knows the real value of his property, and that the fraudulent representations will fall.

It is not necessary to go into the details of this affair, but the suffering endured by the members, by the breaking up of their homes and the expense of transporting themselves and their furniture long distances from various States of this Union, should, after this exposé, be a warning to reformers of all classes to look well to the character of those who start projects with the ostensible purpose of recuperating failing fortunes.

At a meeting of the community the following resolution was passed, receiving the signature of the President and Secretary, and all of the members of the Dawn Valcour Community, excepting John Wilcox and five other members, some of the five believing in the fraud, but not voting for other reasons.

"Resolved, That the members of Dawn Valcour Community regard the past representations in regard to Orrin Shipman's property as a stupendous fraud."

"ASPECTS OF UNITARIANISM."

William J. Potter, of New Bedford, lately preached two discourses on some aspects of Unitarianism in its past and recent history, which have been published at the request of his parish. He dwells at length on the free-thinking, progressive character of the Unitarian movement in its earlier days, and down to the period of the New York Convention in 1865. Since then it has gradually relinquished its progressive and freedom-loving characteristics, and hardened into a sect. "It cries halt to progress, that it may hold to authority. And thus it offers another illustration of arrested development in religious history." Mr. Potter says that "Unitarianism, by its history and by its fundamental principles, by its emphasis of the inherent worth of human nature, and of the right of free inquiry, and of the supreme importance of character as a test of religion, stood in a position of special advantage for aiding in the elevation of Christianity to the plane of free and universal religion. To this work it was called by the voice of the age and by the voice of its own past service. What the Brahmo Somaj is doing for Hinduism in India, what the progressive Jews are doing for Judaism, what Liberal Mohammedans and Buddhists are doing for their respective faiths—lifting them out of provincial claims and theological narrowness, into the breadth and unity of a world-wide faith,—this is the task to which Unitarianism was summoned in behalf of Christianity. But it is a task which the Unitarian organizations, at least in America, have declined to take up. The work now falls to other hands."

We cannot quite share Mr. Potter's conviction, though entirely sympathizing with his impatience of the hesitating spirit and halting course of a body whose history and position elect it to a pioneer work. The ism must be distinguished from its organizations, and all that was ever true and vital in Unitarian principles remains intact, and has not been cancelled by the votes of conventions, nor neutralized by the timidity or narrowness of sectarian managers. But it must be remembered that, though progressive in principle and profession, the Unitarian body has always been peculiarly conservative. It opposed Mr. Parker with unyielding pertinacity for twenty years, and nearly ostracized the men who openly sympathized with his views and approved his position. For forty years the conservative element has been in the ascendancy in its councils, and kept a strong brake on its wheels. Its present opposition to the Free Religious movement, of which Mr. Potter is a leader, is historically consistent, and far more logical than its treatment of the Transcendentalists and Theodore Parker. They were neither anti-Christian nor un-Christian; but Mr. Abbot, with THE INDEX, has succeeded in giving the Free Religious Association a distinctly anti-Christian reputation which is repugnant alike to Unitarian thinking and feeling, and in direct antagonism with all its previous life. Mr. Potter, in dropping the Christian name and acting with Mr. Abbot, has seemed to put himself in the same attitude; and though it might sustain the closest relations with a man who simply drops the Christian name in the interest of what he thinks a more comprehensive and vital religion, we fail to see how a body that is Christian in any intelligible sense can retain an anti-Christian preacher in its fellowship, or go out of its way to express sympathy for an association that is understood to antagonize the Christian religion at every point.—Golden Age, Jan. 16, 1875.

[It is exceedingly unfair to hold the Free Religious Association, or any of its members, responsible for anything that we may say or do. The editor of the Golden Age knows this perfectly well. He knows that Mr. Potter has not only never taken an anti-Christian stand, but has not even felt called upon to reject the Christian name with any marked emphasis: he has simply declined to call himself by it. The only sense in which Mr. Clarke can decently call Mr. Potter an "anti-Christian preacher" is that in which we call all liberals anti-Christians, because they favor freedom; and this sense makes Mr. Clarke himself one of them. We protest against the injustice of putting the odium of our extremism on anybody's shoulders; we are nowise so connected with anybody as to render him in any degree responsible for our utterances. We deny having "succeeded in giving the Free Religious Association a distinctly anti-Christian reputation," because we have never made any such attempt. If the necessary, logical outcome of the principles asserted in the Association's Constitution is opposition to Christianity, and if we have succeeded in making that plain, well and good; that we have tried to do. But we have never tried to make the Association, collectively or individually, responsible for our own application of those principles; and we would defend the right both of the Association and of all its members not to be held responsible for it. We regret that we did not see the above article in time to make an earlier protest; and we hold that the Golden Age owes it to Mr. Potter to correct its gross injustice towards him.—Ed.]

MATERIALIZATION.

A CLEVER IMITATION OF THE SPIRIT HAND PERFORMANCE.

The young man whose successful imitation of the performances of the dark circle was described in these columns, some weeks ago, has been at work since on materialization, and has become quite an adept. He had just given an exhibition before a large party of friends at his own home, and succeeded in thoroughly mystifying them and producing on the minds of many an impression quite as strong as that produced by the exploits of mediums. His performance was by no means a copy of Mrs. Hardy's, the arrangements and conditions being quite different, but several persons who had seen both declared his to be quite as marvellous as that of the medium, though others thought not. Some thirty people were gathered in a large parlor. At one end, a space some ten or twelve feet square was enclosed with maroon curtains, attached to frames about five feet high. The enclosure stood quite back against the end of the room, and was a considerable distance from any door leading out of it. In the middle of this enclosed space was a small, black table, triangular in form, on the top of which was a black box with a hole in front about five inches square. The room was carefully examined and the curtain frames forming the enclosure were put up in the presence of the spectators. The little table and box were simplicity itself, the former being a plain surface, supported on three legs, without drapery, partitions, or any chance for concealed mechanism, and the latter, equally plain and of half-inch board, covered with black cloth. After ample opportunity for examination had been given, the spectators were seated in lines at the other end of the room.

The young man assumed the character of a medium very cleverly, and said that, for the sake of allowing the spirits to congregate and to get up the proper influences, it would be necessary to place a curtain in front of the enclosure, shutting it from view for a few moments. While this was done, there was music and singing to harmonize the circle, and then the curtain was removed. The table and box still remained in the middle of the open space, detached from everything else, and to all appearance precisely as they were before. The light of the chandeliers was partly turned down, but two candles were lighted at the corners of the enclosure, and on the whole the room was well lighted. In answer to questions as to whether the powers were ready, distinct raps were heard in the direction of the box. The "medium" then called for a hand to appear, and a delicate hand, apparently that of a child twelve or fourteen years old, became clearly visible at the opening of the box; then two hands were seen together, and afterwards apparently several, in motion at the same time. These hands made movements in response to questions, and rapped distinctly on the box, and at one time spelt out words by the deaf and dumb alphabet. They also passed out several flowers, including pinks, heliotrope, lily of the valley, etc., all fresh and fragrant, which were handed to the spectators. Blank cards were placed in blank envelopes by several persons and sealed. These being placed in the hand in the box, were almost instantly returned directed to the persons from whom they came. The seals being broken, the cards were found to bear an exact fac-simile of the person's autograph, with some message on the reverse side. Afterwards, two faces were made to appear in succession at the opening of the box, differing entirely in appearance.

The performance closed with the production of lights in the air, the gas being entirely turned off for the purpose. The table, box, and everything pertaining to the exhibition were freely examined at the close, as well as at the beginning of the performance. We have described it simply as it appeared. Of course, the whole thing was a matter of trick and illusion, and pretended to be nothing else. However it was done, it differed altogether from the manifestations at Mrs. Hardy's, but was scarcely less puzzling to the beholders.—Boston Globe, Feb. 11.

A PANAMA CORRESPONDENT of the San Francisco Chronicle speaks thus of a Catholic army in South America: "His Holiness the Pope must read with rare pleasure the solemn acts of the free and independent republic of Ecuador. His faithful devotee, President Garcia Moreno, has, as Cabinet members, learned Jesuits, and they have prevailed upon Moreno and the republic's legislators to enact a certain class of laws, whereby religion, morality and order are to be preserved. The first and most remarkable edict is that which divides the army into four divisions, with such fanciful titles in detail as 'Division of the Son of God,' 'Division of the Good Shepherd,' 'Holy Lancers of Death,' 'Warriors of the Blessed Virgin,' etc. In thus organizing the army, the republic was first, with great pomp and solemnity, put under the protection of the 'Sacred Heart of Jesus.' President Moreno is commander-in-chief, and every officer and soldier is sworn to uphold and defend the 'Holy Roman Catholic Church.' The organization of this army has caused derision among the other republics of South America. Some journals, however, look upon it in a grave light, and consider that it is the renewed effort of clergy to get political as well as religious power in their hands. They have thoroughly accomplished this in Ecuador, and it being so, what is to hinder them from pushing their conquests into neighboring republics? As will be seen hereafter, they are making the effort."

GARIBALDI wore the traditional costume when he was sworn in the Italian Parliament—a red shirt, white mantle, and blue cap embroidered with gold. When he answered, in a clear voice, "Giuro" (I swear), there was a burst of applause, and cries of "Bravo."

Poetry.

[For THE INDEX.]

A COMPLAINT.

The greatest sin of modern times
Is not the making of bad rhymes,
Is not the waste of printer's ink,
What women write and children think,
Not gambling debts or mortgaged land,—
'Tis the everlasting book in hand.
Continual reading day and night
Makes sodden brains and bad eye-sight.
Full many a soul, born to aspire,
Has sunk as low as it aimed higher;
The fuel has put out the fire.
Books are the ministers of thought,
But, void of thinking, they are not;
They waste your time on prose or verse,
The ministers of something worse.
In the most cultured spots you find
The most "green-sickness" of the mind,—
An affectation, if you please,
An intellectual disease.
Pure nature has died out of schools,
And reading fills the world with fools.
The youthful minds are stuffed with bran
Upon the right Blimberian plan.
This getting rid of mother-wit,
And putting "chaff" instead of it;
Not "education" you will find,
But sausage-making of the mind.
The boy is stuffed, but, once a man,
He leaves the stuffing and the bran
To teachers and trustees of schools,
To breed another race of fools.
The weight of this gigantic curse
Comes on the children worse and worse,
Who, nothing taught except to read,
Grow light and vain, not worth their feed—
The boys half-baked with brains of dough,
And girls who neither bake nor sew.
But then they know so much, they will Know all things yet, and know them ill.
To add the total sum: result,
All children now are born adult.

Oh for some greater solitude
For mind itself to be immured!
Where, leaving books upon the shelves,
We grow acquainted with ourselves:
Some barren rock or isle o' the sea
Where modern learning may not be;
Safe from the vile Sirocco-curse
Of newspapers, which children nurse
On scandal, politics, and verse.
The strongest fertilizer kills;
So fatal knowledge quick instills
A poison in the veins of youth,
Which withers virtue, goodness, truth.
What opium does to the Chinese,
Rum to the Indian whom we fleece,
Excessive reading does for us;
Won't some reformer make a fuss?
Too much top-dressing to the mind
Is worse than nothing, you will find:
It's gin and opium combined.

The Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 4, 1875.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 1, TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

REV. MR. SAVAGE's article, promised for this week, will appear next week, owing to a miscalculation of dates for which he is not at all responsible.

THE "Dawn Valcour Community" have voted that hey "regard the past representations of Orrin Shipman's property as a stupendous fraud." All who have any interest in this matter are referred to an article which is copied in another column from the Burlington, Vermont, Free Press and Times.

SOMEBODY has lately been distributing the Index Tract entitled "The Impeachment of Christianity" in Dover, New Hampshire, as we infer from an irate editorial article in the Morning Star. This tirade is too amusing not to serve as pepper for our weekly repast, and will be found in another column. Internal evidence satisfies us that it is not the composition of the senior editor of the Star, Dr. Day, who is a gentleman, and quite incapable of the vulgarity and unscrupulous misstatements of this journalistic explosion.

THAT SUCH an advertisement as this one should be profitable anywhere in the nineteenth century, is deplorable. We find it in Common Sense, a Spiritualist paper of San Francisco, which also publishes regular communications from this "Professor" of imposture who shamelessly puts his leeches to the pocket-books of the superstitious: "Professor W. H. Chaney, 314 Bush Street, Room No. 5. The Professor has located permanently in San Francisco, as above, for the practice of ASTROLOGY. He will also teach the science to such as may desire to obtain a knowledge of this celestial art, which includes among its pupils and admirers such minds as Galileo, Sir Isaac Newton, Tycho Brahe, Kepler, and hosts of the best astronomers of the past. In the long lists of persons advertised in this city, under the head of 'Astrologers,' there is not one who knows anything of the science. Those calling themselves 'astrologers' are simply 'fortune-tellers,' who divine through a teacup or pack of cards, and by their charlatanism have done much towards bringing genuine astrology into disrepute. Office hours from 10 to 12 A.M., and from 2 to 4 P.M. Receptions for the evening may be secured by special arrangement."

THE Union Era, a religious paper once published in New York in the interest of Evangelical consolidation of forces, has been defunct for a year or two. An old clipping from it contains this story, under the title of "A Feline Illustration": "There is one member of our printing establishment that we have never brought to the public notice. Pussy is a white cat, whose precise function in the office we do not know, unless it is to be a thermometer, her distance from the stove marking the warmth of the room. Pussy is not yet a full convert to our union doctrines, as there is still an old prejudice which she entertains against rats. But she favored us the other day with an illustration which may be edifying to our readers nevertheless. By some oversight Pussy's morning ration had not been brought, and towards ten o'clock we heard about it. With eyes wide open, and tail aloft, she came up to Gabley, and said, 'Me-au-aw.' Gabley was busy at the proof-press and paid no attention. Kitty repeated her remark. Louder and louder did she cry until the whole room resounded with her appeals, and the public peace required that the petitioner should be attended to. 'Gabley,' said we, as he turned to get Kitty's breakfast, 'Gabley, do you know what that is? It is Prayer.' Does anybody wonder that the Union Era is as dead as Julius Cæsar? That cat-story alone ought to have killed it.

THE FOUR AUTHORITIES.

1. The Roman Catholic Church has always presented itself to the world as the ultimate criterion of religious and moral truth. This claim it makes not in its own name as a human institution, but in God's name as a divine institution created and sustained by him for the express purpose of communicating to mankind an infallible revelation of his will.

Previous to 1870, this infallibility was held to reside in the Church Universal, uttering its authoritative decisions through its General or Ecumenical Councils; while there was a division among faithful Catholics on the question whether the Pope himself was to be accounted infallible. But the Jesuits, who represent most boldly and consistently the inherent tendencies of the Catholic Church, perceived that there is a defect in the logic which attributes infallibility to Councils, even on the hypothesis that God perpetually inspires his Holy Church. Councils must deliver their decisions by means of suffrage; and, since unanimity cannot be secured in the case of any deliberative assembly, a perplexity arises which endangers the spiritual authority of all such decisions. In order to make the voice of the Council an infallible revelation of his own will, God must inspire the individual voters to cast their votes correctly; and the difficulty comes up with regard to the votes of the defeated minority. Did God inspire the minority to vote amiss? Then the veracity of God and the validity of the majority vote are dangerously doubtful. Did he not inspire the minority at all? Then the claim that he inspired the majority becomes exceedingly questionable. Either he inspired all the voters of the Council, or (sceptics would unanswerably urge) he inspired none of them. If he inspired all, how came any to vote wrong? The only way for the majority to vindicate the authority of its own decisions would be to chop off the heads of all the minority, on the ground that they had voted wilfully against the instructions of the Holy Spirit. If, however, it should be held that God did not inspire all, but selected just enough voters as recipients of his inspiration to ensure a correct decision, the suspicion that he inspired none at all could not be repressed. Absolute unanimity in the Council would alone avoid such difficulties; and that could never yet be attained. The plea of infallibility in Councils is thus exposed to this fatal dilemma; either all the voters were inspired to cast their suffrages as they did, in which case the minority were inspired to vote wrong, or else they were not inspired to cast their suffrages as they did, in which case the decisions of the majority were not infallible. The notion of a general inspiration, as distinct from that of the particular members, is quite too absurd to require examination.

Forced by this logical defect to carry out and develop more fully the idea of infallible revelation, the Jesuits were keen enough to see that a single man, the Pope, who could not be split up into majority and minority, must be held to be personally infallible, or else the whole claim of infallibility would give way. In bringing about this latest development of Catholic Christianity, the Jesuits were perfectly true to its fundamental logic, and to the fundamental logic of Christianity in all its forms. An infallible Pope is the necessary outcome of the Church's claim to possess an infallible revelation; and the Jesuits must be regarded, not as the corrupters, but as the radical unfolders, of Catholicism. If they are also the deadliest opponents of free thought, that is because Christianity and freedom of all kinds are fundamentally opposed. Jesuitism is Jesus-ism; and the claim of Jesus himself to be the Christ is the sole root of Catholicism, one of the two roots of Protestantism, and that which makes Christianity in all its forms an encroachment on the liberties of mankind.

2. The Protestant Christian Church (disregarding for the present its subdivision into sects and its various Neo-Christian degenerations) has always presented the Bible as the ultimate criterion of moral and religious truth. It has always rejected the claim of the Catholic Church to be the sole interpreter of the Bible, either by its Councils or its Popes; it has always asserted the "right of private judgment," however inconsistently it has also asserted the authority of creeds and synods. But this "right of private judgment" is only the right of interpreting the Bible, not the right of rejecting it as the infallible revelation of the Divine will. No form of Protestantism has ever ventured to discard the infallibility of the Bible; even the extremest collective utterances of Unitarianism assume the infallibility of at least parts of it, unless resort is had to quibbling esoteric interpretations, double meanings, and mental reservations.

But the difficulty that besets the pretension of Councils to be the infallible voice of God besets the same pretension made for the Bible, and in a greatly aggravated shape. Either the whole Bible is infallible, or none of it is; and history shows that, whenever the literal infallibility of any part of the book is surrendered, there is no stopping until that of all the other parts is surrendered, one by one. There are thousands of texts in the Bible; and if there is an infallible revelation in the book as a whole, then all these texts must tell a perfectly harmonious story. They must be unanimous; they must all vote in the same way. But no amount of ingenuity can make them all vote in the same way; and it is just as true to say that the members of Catholic Councils have always been unanimous as it is to say that the texts of the Bible are unanimous. Precisely the same difficulty about the majority and the minority comes up concerning the deliverances of the Bible, which we have just shown to have come up concerning the decisions of the Councils. The "private judgment" of the Protestant, trying to interpret the Bible for itself, is perplexed by majority and minority votes, cast by these multitudinous texts in reply to each and every question he puts. Some texts vote yes, others no; he is distracted by their discord; he gets no unanimous response; and his case is even more dismaying than the Catholic's, because he must himself decide, unaided, what is the majority vote of the texts, while the Catholic finds the majority vote of the Council announced by the Council itself, and formally promulgated by the now infallible Pope. In short, if one is determined to find an infallible revelation somewhere, the harder it is to find in proportion as he strays from Rome.

These—the Church and the Bible—are the two great authorities claimed and believed to be infallible. There are two other authorities for which no such claim is made.

3. The "right of private judgment," which is the root of Protestantism on its purely human side, conflicts with the "infallible authority" of Church, Bible, Christ, which is the root of Protestantism on its strictly Christian side. From these two roots proceed tendencies which create in Protestantism internal antagonism of a wholly irreconcilable nature. The general momentum of Protestantism is in the direction of Reason, and away from Rome. The first effect of discarding both of the infallible authorities, Church and Bible, is to produce an excess of emphasis on the "private judgment" which has discarded them. It is a natural reaction against Catholicism to repudiate all claims of universal authority, and to rest in the authority of the individual,—to accept the latter, not as infallible, but simply as the best at hand, the best that is possible under actual conditions. This authority of the individual reason, as the ultimate ground of all convictions concerning truth, is the highest authority recognized by Individualism. It is the fundamental principle of the prevalent transcendental or intuitional type of radicalism, so far as this has any philosophical basis at all. It places the supreme appeal in the mind of each individual, and makes him a judge whose decisions must be accepted, at least by himself, as final and conclusive. It emancipates him from all obligation to defer to the objective; and, while it makes no pretence of setting him above the possibility of mistake and is therefore not justly chargeable with making him infallible in his own conceit, it nevertheless precludes the possibility of correcting any mistake into which he may fall.

But, although an inevitable reaction against the oppressive rule of the infallible authorities of Catholicism and Protestantism, and therefore a beneficent one to that extent, this absolute supremacy of the individual reason, which is the ground-principle of the radicalism that is most widely prevalent to-day, fails to give an adequate criterion to those who desire to know what is true. When individuals differ, as they are sure to do, each can only throw himself back on his own private affirmation, which is valid for himself alone, and has no validity whatever for others. This is the fatal embarrassment of Individualism. It destroys all common ground among men, and makes each individual the Robinson Crusoe of a desert island, the solitary inhabitant of a subjective certitude which is incertitude to all the world besides. So long as merely "private judgment" is the ultimate and decisive tribunal in all questions concerning truth, each thinker is a moral Ishmael, "his hand against every man and every man's hand against him." There is no common ground; every difference of opinion becomes a bottomless abyss, over which no bridge can be thrown. In short, Individualism is Protestantism gone to seed. Catholicism sacrifices liberty to secure unity; Protestantism sacrifices unity to secure liberty; Science alone can secure liberty and unity both.

4. Instead of the authority of individual reason, which is the ground-principle of Individualism and the logical ultimate of that "right of private judgment" to which Protestantism has inconsistently and hesitatingly clung, Science proclaims the authority of universal reason, which requires that the decisions of individual reason shall be submitted to the test of observation and experiment—in a word, to verification. It recognizes the partial truths embraced respectively by Catholicism and Individualism, and carries them up into the unity of a higher principle. Catholicism builds on the necessity of an objective criterion of truth, an ultimate tribunal before which conflicting individual opinions may be brought for adjudication; and this necessity is affirmed by Science also. Individualism builds on the right of the individual to resist the false claim of one or more other individuals (Christ, Pope, Church, Councils, Bible writers) to be this ultimate tribunal; and this right is affirmed by Science also. REASON alone is the authority of Science. Not the reason of a few, usurping control over the reason of the many; not the reason of one only, repudiating the obligation of conformity to law and fact; but the reason which is universal, impersonal, grounded on absolute and irreversible laws of intelligence, discoverable only by the submission of all individual thought to the test of verification and direct appeal to the facts of Nature. This authority of the universal reason is not set up by Science as infallible, for there is nothing infallible that is human; but it is set up as the highest appeal, notwithstanding, in all questions that seek the determination of truth. It respects absolutely all rights of the individual, for it subjects him to no arbitrary control, but only requires him to be reasonable; at the same time it gives a common ground to all truth-seekers, and furnishes a common appeal when they differ. It conserves all the elements of truth covered by Catholicism, Protestantism, Individualism, and unites them all in Science. In short, it is the authority of Nature and Truth in their universality, and can be denied by no one who understands clearly what it means.

The Protestant Reformation, repudiating the infallible authority of the Catholic Church, and substituting the infallible authority of the Bible as interpreted by "private judgment," was one of the greatest steps ever taken in the course of human progress. The Transcendentalist Reformation, repudiating the infallible authority of the Bible, and emancipating the "private judgment" from all dependence upon it, although historically less conspicuous, was logically scarcely less important. But the Scientific Reformation which is now going on, substituting UNIVERSAL REASON for Church, Bible, and merely individual reason, as the supreme authority and test of truth, eclipses in importance all previous steps of progress, and will yet be manifest historically in the disappearance of all special religions from the world of human life. It is a change fraught with consequences of incalculable moment to human welfare; and all who can rise out of the petty circle of their own individual concerns will find no subject more worthy of their profoundest thought and most faithful study.

AFTER NO, YES.

Every marked period in the history of reform and progress has two stages. The first is the stage of doubt, denial, and destruction; the second that of belief, affirmation, and construction.

The first of these stages is as natural and inevitable as the second. It has to be invited and welcomed, and assisted to run its course. Every generation has to have its turn of scepticism, which it cannot escape, any more than a child can escape teething. It is to be said perhaps that every healthy and growing mind has its time or times of being sceptical,—of doubting what, ordinarily, seems the most undoubtable. And no man is wise, who is afraid of his doubts; for that belief is of little worth, which is bottomed on either ignorance or cowardice. If we are not brave enough to deny, we are not wise enough to affirm. If we cannot have the resolution to destroy, we cannot have the skill to construct. The boy whom ambition never spurs to leave the parental roof, and quit his native surroundings, will never step into that freedom of action and that nobility of achievement to which growing manhood invites him. So, too, the age that is content to live on the traditions of the past, and never to question them, is sure to suppress its own vital spirit, and miss the larger truth that is ever dawning. If we would breathe the air of inspiration that is constantly blowing fresh from the hills of God, we must occasionally break out of all institutions and establishments, and trust ourselves in the open weather of doubt and vigorous free inquiry.

But no individual or age can live and thrive on mere scepticism. On the average, faith is a better nutriment for the soul than doubt. When a man remains too long a sceptic, he is just as sure to become narrow, dogmatic, and juiceless, as when he remains too long a contented and habitual believer. Freedom is not an end to be satisfied with, but a method. Unless freedom lead to higher knowledge, deeper faith, and broader-mindedness, the bondage of ignorance and sloth is just as good. The spirit of denial and destruction alone brings waste and desolation; it should be followed speedily by that of affirmation and construction, which will build "more stately mansions" for mind and heart.

Those periods of history have been noblest, on the whole, which have been characterized, not by the most unbelief, but by the most belief. Scepticism is a strong, rough wind which is necessary to blow away the malaria of superstition; but the lungs of humanity, once relieved from the latter, cannot endure to have the former continue indefinitely: the milder, gentler air of faith suits them better for a steady climate. One age of faith should soon succeed another, as we like best to have two summers divided only by a short though vigorous winter. Where either extreme coldness or heat prevails all the year round, civilization is in a low and stunted state. So, likewise, when either scepticism or superstition holds unbroken sway, the intellect and soul of man are shrunken and deadened. It is the temperate zone, in both the spiritual and the material world, which produces the best humanity.

We cannot build a philosophy, much less a religion, out of mere negations; and although I am well aware that there are those who deny that man has any need of either, yet this, too, I believe, is one of the negations which we shall do well to put behind us. Socrates was not a fool, nor was Jesus a crack-brained enthusiast. These two men stand in history for something real and positive in human nature. Man is both a reasoner and a worshipper; and what he wants to do is to find out if there be a reasonable religion which he can understand and believe in. Anything which helps to this end is in order; anything which hinders this consummation cannot long survive.

What those who now advocate free thought need to do is to consider if they are making the most they can of those creative and constructive elements which belong to human nature; if they are dealing sufficiently in reasonable affirmations; if they are advancing fast enough into that position where they can report something substantial and satisfactory to the intellect, the conscience, and the heart. They should bear in mind that they will be most gratefully remembered, not for the error they take away from the faith of this time, but for the truth they add to it; not for what they overthrow and cast down, but for what they build up and establish on the most rational foundations. They are foolish to content themselves too long with defiant posturing before the popular religion of to-day; their ambition ought to be to astonish it by drawing a larger circle of truth around its position, and to shame it by showing a diviner spirit and a more comprehensive faith. Have we denied that there is any God outside of the universe?—then let us see if we can show the greater God who is in it; who is in the wonderful force and life that thrill through all. Have we denied the authority of old scriptures and traditions?—then let us be so eager and docile to learn the truth, that we shall attain it quite as surely as those who trust to supposed infallible guides. Have we denied that Christianity is incompatible with freedom?—then let us prove ourselves to be so free from prejudice outside of it, that we can do full justice to everything and everybody inside of it.

It requires far less courage and wisdom to achieve the superficial victories of war, than the more substantial ones of peace. Iconoclasm is a cheap and easy accomplishment, and many are they who are equal to it, and who take delight in it. Fewer those who can build a true shrine of the soul, who can erect a temple for real divinities, and establish a home for the fair humanities. But these shrines and temples and homes will be needed always; and blessed always shall be the memory of those who are equal to their construction!

A. W. S.

"BY THEIR FRUITS."

A correspondent of [THE INDEX, "L. M. T.," in the number for February 4th, makes some strictures on a discourse of mine, published January 21st, on "Worship in the Nineteenth Century." The main point of the criticism seems to be that the discourse lays too much stress on formal services as an expression of religious sentiment, and not enough on good and philanthropic works. The writer says: "Our virtue must be a virtue of good impulse, good thought, and good action," but thinks that the doctrine of the discourse "stops just short of this last."

This criticism struck me as so strange that it excited a smile at first; for the burden of my discourses to my congregation turns so constantly on this one thought,—the uselessness of all so-called services of worship, if they do not issue in practical virtue and philanthropy,—the superiority, in fact, of all good works to worshipful forms,—that it has been frequently said, and I have sometimes myself so thought, that, if my preaching were carried into practice, my church would be speedily emptied. It was, therefore, at first thought, somewhat refreshing to find myself charged with conservative teaching on this point! But, on second thought, I was led to inquire whether I might not have left the discourse somewhat defective on this question for the general reader, on account of my safely assuming that the audience for whom it was specially meant would well understand my meaning. I wish, therefore, to say, with all possible explicitness and earnestness, that I should affirm with "L. M. T." that "the feeling whose expression is limited to forms is false and worthless. To retain its force and integrity, every feeling must be expressed in earnest action toward some end." "We must do something for the betterment of humanity; not for amelioration merely, but for prevention of evils. Our impulses die for want of propagation in acts."

All this I thought, to be sure, was said in the discourse. In all that I said of morality, I certainly meant to speak not merely of a "negative" virtue, but of something very positive. Something very like the sentences above quoted was at least contained in the sentence which "L. M. T." quotes as the key of the whole question: "If religious emotion does not issue in good works, it proves itself of little worth;" and there were other kindred sentences. But if this thought was not expressed strongly enough, let me express it with all possible strength now. There is no other test to which I would bring religious feeling, or participation in formal religious services, than just this: What is the practical fruit in conduct? And I would uphold the Sunday service, not as it too generally is, but as it might be, solely for its help towards making individuals and society better. I regard it not as an end in itself, but only as a means towards this high end of human amelioration and progress.

Now there may be an honest difference of opinion as to whether the Sunday service, even in any form, can be made conducive to this result; though I think some of "L. M. T.'s" arguments are addressed rather against the service as it usually is than against what it might be. That Garrison and Sumner did not find the inspiration for their work in the churches may be readily admitted. Of the latter I have heard an anecdote which I do not remember to have seen in print. The faithful colored attendant at his house in Washington, on being asked where Mr. Sumner went to church, replied: "Mr. Sumner has too much to do, and doesn't fool away his time in going to church." But the Sumners and Garrisons are rare. They themselves belong to the race of prophets, and their work is a part of the church of humanity, and ought to be, in its aims, a part of the organized church. Suppose there were such men in the pulpits and on the Sunday platforms of America; would not the Sunday service become an effective power in shaping public opinion to the noblest practical ends? There were a few such men in American pulpits during the anti-slavery struggle, and more after the war broke out,—men who stood up bravely and persistently to apply to all national questions the principles of truth and justice; and their influence shows what possibilities for good lie in the customary assembling of people on one leisure day of the week to consider matters pertaining to their highest welfare.

The prevailing tone of the Sunday service may indeed be criticised; the subjects introduced are for the most part too antiquated and too theological; and there are doubtless many persons who would find little help from such a service in any event; yet for large multitudes of people it has capacities in the way of mental and moral and philanthropic culture which do not seem to me to be yet exhausted. Nor are these multitudes, according to my observation, made up so exclusively of the two extremes of society—"the rich and the fashionable" and "the ignorant and superstitious"—as "L. M. T." appears to think. The "steady and reliable" middle class is well represented among them.

Doubtless temperament has very much to do with this matter of church-going and with the benefit to be derived from it. What one may find spiritually elevating and provocative of moral and humane effort may have no effect upon another. To one the discourse may be the main thing. Another may be most stirred by the music. Still another may find religious feeling most vitalized by silent meditation, or by communion with Nature or with a book, or in some active philanthropic work. To "aver that no true and virile religious feeling is born of pictures and music" seems to me a very sweeping statement which loses sight of this constitutional difference in human nature. Mr. Sumner may have found little inspiration in an ordinary religious service, but he does seem to have found some in pictures. And I have known persons who were moved to heroic moral effort by strains of music. With my Quaker temperament and training, I may hardly understand how it can be so, more than does "L. M. T."; yet I am constrained to admit the fact.

But it was not so much to reply to "L. M. T.'s" excellent letter that I began to write, as to accept its main thought, that religious feeling must express itself in action,—that it must prove its worth by appearing in pure character and good deed. If the Sunday service does not help to this, I have no word to say in its defence. I would bring church-goers and non-church-goers alike to the test, "By their fruits ye shall know them." There are noble workers for humanity in both classes. But I am not sure that, as a class, the non-church-goers, though criticising the church-goers for their inactivity in humane works, have a much better record to show for themselves—the anti-slavery reform always excepted. I have sometimes been greatly disappointed to find a valiant critic of the church-goers' short-comings in this respect prove as inefficient in practical work as they. Most of the organized benevolence of my own city is carried on by those who are attendants of some kind of church. "By their fruits" is a test, therefore, to be applied to all.

FREE-THOUGHT NOTES.

BY A VETERAN ENGLISH FREE-THINKER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—The case which Mr. Joseph Treat puts before THE INDEX is one of interest, and warrants some report of the state of the law of evidence in this country. Progress is very slow in this old territory, but in some respects we are in advance of America. If Mr. Treat were in this country, he could give evidence irrespective of any speculative opinion he may entertain as to the origin of the universe. We have lately had two cases which have brought this out very plainly before the public. One is that of Mr. Jacob Waring, a manufacturer of Burnley, in Lancashire. He was called upon to serve upon a jury. When he requested to make affirmation, he was refused by the coroner. As Mr. Waring is a person of good repute and intelligence, no doubt was entertained as to the integrity of his verdict. The coroner was simply ignorant of the existence of the law, and he even denied it when brought to his notice. In London, since I last wrote, a person appeared before Mr. Woolrych, one of our stipendiary magistrates, who are supposed to be well informed, to give evidence, which Mr. Woolrych refused on the ground that the witness confessed to having no religious belief; meaning the kind of belief usually exacted by the court. When told that an Act of Parliament enabled him, notwithstanding, to give evidence, Mr. Woolrych denied that it was so; and, when the Acts were subsequently taken to him, he refused to recognize them, on the ground that there was a higher authority than the law which required a religious belief, or words to that effect. We need in England a society to present magistrates and law officers with copies of new Acts of Parliament, for their ignorance of them is often conspicuous and discreditable.

Mr. Woolrych's conduct has been resented, and a mandamus has been applied for, and granted by the Lord Chief Justice, to show cause for declining to recognize the validity of the man in question, and to take the evidence he rejected. Until 1869, we had made no further progress in the admission of evidence than that of allowing persons who were believers in the New Testament injunction of Christ to "swear not at all," to make affirmation. But a person objecting to an oath, on whatever ground of conscience other than that, was not allowed to take it.

For more than thirty years I used unceasing exertions with successive Parliaments to get a bill brought in and passed, which should enable heretics to make affirmation upon their honor, and quite irrespective of their opinions. By the courage of Sir John Trelawny a bill for this purpose was brought before the English Parliament, and was several times rejected. The long history of the adventures of this bill would be curious reading, if the story was told. The delay in procuring the Act was promoted by persons of known disbelief appearing before courts and taking the oath.

Sir George Cornewall Lewis said, when appealed to to support an alteration of the law, that it was an argument against the bill, since, unbelievers being found to take the oath, it was a proof of no grievance. I was not among these persons, as I never took an oath in my life. In no question of property or peril did I consent to do so. When one of my sons was killed, I was prevented giving evidence in the coroner's court against the man who did it.

What was wanted was to get a case in which the public were interested about the evidence, and in which public justice would be scandalized by its failure through the requirement of the oath. A case of this sort at length occurred when a man named Dedanias murdered two poor girls on the sands of Dover. A Mr. Girling, who found the bodies, came to me for advice, as he was an atheist in the Orthodox sense of the term, as to what he should do. My answer was, "State to the court what your opinions are, and that you are willing to give evidence, and will take the oath, as a legal ceremony committing you to the penalty for perjury in case of tendering false evidence, providing the court will administer the oath to you, knowing it not to be binding otherwise on your conscience." "If the court refuse," answered Mr. Girling, "this murderer may get off." My reply was, "It is your duty to take care of your conscience, and the duty of the court to take care of justice." His evidence was refused, and the clerk of the court declined to pay the witness his expenses; but Judge Kenyon, who tried the case, ordered Mr. Girling's expenses to be paid, recognizing that he had acted as an honest man, and the fault lay in the law. The Hon. Mr. Denman, now himself a judge, stated afterwards in the House of Commons, of which he was then a member, that the evidence of an atheist ought to be made legal; for, could they not have found other evidence than Mr. Girling's, the villainous murderer of these poor girls might have escaped justice. Mr. Denman was counsel for the crown against the murderer.

At length it came to pass that, in 1869, a clause was inserted in a bill for the "Amendment of Evidence," to the effect that any person should be enabled to give testimony upon simple affirmation, providing the court had reason to believe he is not a person to whom an oath could be properly administered. Of course the affirmation rendered him liable to the punishment of perjury as though he had taken an oath. The first time the Act was used was in an arbitration case, when an objection was raised that the room in which the arbitration was held was not a court of justice, and the Act stated that an affirmation might be administered in any court of justice. It turned out that there was no general legal definition of a legal court of justice; and in 1870 a further Act was passed, called "the Evidence Amendment Act Amended," which defined a court of justice to be any court in which an oath may be administered, and the presiding judge to be any judge empowered to administer the same.

These are the two Acts the existence of which was denied by the coroner of Burnley and Mr. Woolrych of London. The effect of this enfranchisement of the evidence of heretics is very singular. If a witness appears to give evidence, the court, on learning that he is not a Christian, admits him to make an affirmation, and, not being a Christian, he can be believed upon his word; but if the court has reason to suspect that the witness is a believer of any kind, and holds in any form the Christian belief, he cannot be believed upon his word, but is compelled to take an oath, before the court can regard him as credible. So that in this country it is Christians who labor under disabilities, and I suppose we ought to bring in a bill to relieve them! The only way in which Christians can be raised to an equality with heretics is by the abolition of oaths altogether, and the substitution in their place of a universal law of simple affirmation. The late Lord Lyndhurst, the greatest conservative judge we have had in modern times, was strongly in favor of this, and the most reasonable Christians are beginning to see it would be far more respectful to Christianity, and diminish the profaneness of taking the name of God, as is every day done when false evidence is tendered, to abolish oath-taking entirely, and make evidence, as marriage has been made in this country, a civil instead of a religious ceremony. It was a great scandal to philosophy that men like John Stuart Mill, Francis William Newman, or Professor Huxley, or Professor Tyndall, might be turned out of court with contumely, if they were called upon to give evidence, and answered questions as to the nature of their religious belief. This is all over now, and English law courts are no longer courts of theological inquisition.

For myself I have no prejudice against the oath because it is a religious ceremony, but because, when taken by a person not holding the faith in which the oath was administered by the court, it amounted to a reservation of opinion justly deemed dishonorable. When Jews, Catholics, Quakers, and very humble Christians, constantly incurred peril and loss by refusing to pretend to opinions they did not hold, it seemed to me unfortunate that free-thinkers should appear to the public less scrupulous. Bentham had pointed out that, if an atheist happened to be the indispensable witness of a murder, and confessed his atheism, his evidence would be refused, and he would possess the prerogative of a king, that of pardoning the murderer. Had disbelievers as a rule refused to take the oath, then the course of justice would have been arrested so frequently that their evidence must have been legalized long ago.

You will have heard, no doubt with regret, that the famous clerical visitor you had from this country, Canon Kingsley, is dead. It was only a short time ago that I went down to hear him preach in Westminster Abbey. His voice was far-reaching over all the mighty crowd gathered to hear him. He appeared then to be quite recovered from the illness he contracted on the Rocky Mountains. There is reason to think that he made too free with the east wind, whose praises he was first to sing in a noble song. But the east wind was a dangerous acquaintance for a man whose brain was so active, and whose pen was so continually in his hand, as was the case with the energetic Canon. In the last letter I received from him he said, with his usual friendliness, that, when he came into residency at the Canonry in Westminster, he hoped to see me down there. When I last met him, it was at the Social Science Congress at Bristol, when he came up to me in his frank way, saying, "It's a great many years since you and I attempted to reform the world together"; in which he had a right to think on his part that progress had been made, and that he had helped it. Many years ago, when I was editing the Reasoner and he was editing the Christian Socialist, he answered an article of mine in that paper. If I remember rightly, it related to the familiarity of terms in which he spoke of the ways of God, which I thought implied a knowledge beyond any human attainment of his, as well as want of reverence. On these and other points he had some vigorous words to say; but though I was not insensible of the pleasure and distinction of maintaining a controversy with such a combatant, I refused to do so, on the ground that there were priests enough in the world who did, so far as I could see, no good whatever to humanity, with whom I could discuss questions of theology, and I therefore would not appear as the antagonist of one whom, however I might differ from him in matters of religious conviction, vindicated so eloquently the social rights of workmen, and labored so manfully to promote their coöperative interests. Kingsley had the manners of a priest, and assumed a certain right to speak with authority to the people; but it was blended with so much heartiness and liberality of judgment towards those who took a different view from himself, that it was impossible not to respect him. Kingsley was not liberal in religion, but he had great tolerance; he made few concessions, but his heart was so much larger than his faith that his robust humanity was that which made the greatest impression upon the world.

As yet I am in the wood where the shades are thick; therefore my letter is briefer than I would otherwise make it. The Italians have a proverb that "he who goes slowly goes far." On this principle, I ought to go very far, for I go very slowly.

Yours, nevertheless, with celerity and regard,
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

NOTES FROM WEST WISCONSIN.

"Anything for a sensation"—is the motto of the Chicago Times. In imitation of the New York Herald's menagerie-hoax scare, that paper has been perpetrating a joke on its readers for which some of them are just now highly indignant. "Burning of a Theatre last Night! Hundreds Perish in the Flames!" and similar sensational head-lines, with a long account of the appalling disaster, full details of the harrowing incidents, and names of dead and missing, was the news that lately startled the readers of the Chicago Times. It is true that, in smaller head-lines at the bottom, just where they would not be noticed, was this modest statement: "Description of a supposititious holocaust likely to occur any night." Even had the rural reader read it, he would perhaps have wondered a moment at what sort of thing a "supposititious holocaust" might be, and then hastened on to get the particulars of the "superstitious holocaust," as one called it. It was true the name of the theatre was not given in the head-lines, but of course it would soon appear; and eager, sorrowing readers by thousands, on Saturday night, waded through seven painful columns of minute descriptions of the origin, progress, and fatal result of the dreadful conflagration—to learn at last that they had been cruelly sold. One of the preachers of this place seized the providential occasion to draw a valuable lesson of God's judgment upon theatre-goers. As it turns out that God did not burn the theatre, nor trample to death hundreds of people by a rushing crowd, but warmed the place comfortably, and took the people home safely in hacks and horse-cars, of course it must follow, if logic is logic, that theatres are houses of God, under his special protection.

Of course the Times will take high moral grounds and justify its joke, as the Christian does his cry of hell-fire, on the ground that it is the only means it can employ to arouse the apathetic public to a realizing sense of their imminent danger. It is claimed that the means of exit in case of fire in the theatres is inadequate. The Times professes to base its judgment upon a report made by an examining architect. How much truth there is in this statement, we have no means of knowing. Perhaps it is an appendix to the original joke.

The whole thing furnishes another occasion for comments on the ethics of the press. Before this reaches you, no doubt you will hear the judgment of the press on this reckless trifling with the honest faith of people who buy papers for the news they contain, and find themselves the victims of misplaced confidence. Some people who paid for facts and found themselves cheated by fiction will perhaps indignantly "shut down" on the Times; while others will laugh heartily over the joke, and take more stock in the paper that plays it. As to the grave moral, no one imagines that the door-ways of theatres will be widened an inch, or extra stair-ways be run through the buildings, to facilitate egress. It is a sensation; and sensations pay. If it runs up the subscription list, it will be repeated. If not, the zeal for reform will set fire to no more theatres.

Association of contrary ideas leads from fire to frost. On the temperature of our place, our papers are indulging in what Sydney Smith would call "brilliant flashes of silence." When the mercury sinks into the bulb, cold and stiff, it is regarded high treason to mention it in the papers. If any evil-minded person should say that through January the average temperature here was eleven degrees below zero, mornings, or that the mercury was frozen on three successive mornings in February, or that on February 7 the spirit sank to fifty-two degrees below zero, every loyal son would stoutly deny the slanderous report; for we are bound to admit nothing of this watering place that may prejudice our interests and reputation with pleasure-seekers. But it may be permitted to us to confess that no more invigorating atmosphere can be found than the clear, sharp air that we enjoy. It sends the blood tingling through torpid livers, and makes one to rejoice like "a bridegroom coming out of his chamber." It is the best of tonics, and sure cure of "blues." This is true. Whether the intense cold weather has chilled the zeal of revivalists, or operated on their livers, and banished thoughts of death and fears of the judgment after death, is a question; but the fact is, the excitement has of late subsided. Business is brightening again.

How hard it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! Those who think that the Radicals constitute the only house divided against itself, and who advocate creeds as harmonizers of opinion, would do well to look at the recent Episcopal contest over the election of a bishop of Illinois. Dr. Seymour, of New York, was first elected, but afterwards rejected by the house of deputies. The second choice has fallen on Dr. DeKoven, Rector of Racine College, the candidate of the High Church party. He is called by his friends "the St. Paul of the American church," and is unquestionably a man of piety, purity, executive ability, and theological attainments; but the Low Church party have resolved that no High Churchman shall sit in the chair of honor. They declare that he is an extreme Ritualist, holds unsound views of the Eucharist, and encourages Roman confessionals; and as to submitting to such a pope in the free State of Illinois, they will never do it. So they are circulating among the parishes a "memorial" protesting against the elevation of this second bishop-elect to the episcopate. Let brethren dwell together in unity! Here, in a State of three million inhabitants, the Episcopal Church can count only eight thousand communicants; and yet this little family are at war on some points of doctrine and ceremony which two million nine hundred and ninety-two thousand people regard as about as important as the question, "Who killed Cock Robin?"

The champions of the Doctor assert that he is a High Churchman, but that he is not a Ritualist. Says one: "The vast majority of those who rallied to the support of DeKoven are ready at this time to rise up and defend this church from any inroads of that excessive ceremonial, that romancing cultus, which we call, by misnomer, Ritualism." In refutation of the charge of his being a Ritualist, Dr. DeKoven says himself: "Ritual! I wish the whole world knew how little the Ritual question troubled me, and how little I cared about the particular ritual of any parish, as long as it strove to celebrate the Lord's Supper with pious gravity and holy edification."

In defining his position on what they call the "awful mystery" of the Eucharist, the Doctor says: "Because I said I believe in the presence in the elements, people have held that I must believe in a local, physical, carnal presence in the elements. Let me say that it is impossible for me to say in what sense I hold to a presence in the elements. Where Christ has not defined, I do not define; where the Church has not defined, I do not define. I merely say negatively, as the Church has said, that it is not by transubstantiation; that it is not by identity of substance; and, if you ask me how it is, I answer, I know of but one word to express it, and that word expresses it without defining it, and that word is the consecrated word 'sacramental.' I hold Christ is in sacramental union with the consecrated elements, and that presence is called real, to show it is not a mere figurative presence, and the presence is called spiritual, when it is not a physical, carnal, or corporeal presence. Christ has ascended into heaven, and is sitting on the right hand of the throne of God; and I also hold that he is present in the elements by this way of sacramental union; and how both are true I cannot tell. I hold that Christ is in heaven locally. I hold that he is in the elements spiritually." To us who regard sacramental bread as no more "spiritual" than steam baker's bread, which a schoolboy carries in his dinner-basket, all this metaphysical distinction is metaphysical folly; but why a Low Churchman should object to the above view, so clearly and candidly expressed, is difficult to see. The Doctor's defenders deny the charge that he believes in "Eucharistic adoration," and also that he teaches anything like Roman Catholic confession and forgiveness of sins. In fact, they make him out a moderate churchman, high enough for the highest and low enough for the lowest. And all this discussion, or nearly all, is as to what part of the Jewish peasant, Jesus of Nazareth, who died eighteen centuries ago, and whose ashes are scattered to the four winds of heaven,—what part of this man is in the bread and wine of the sacrament. What a pity men cannot eat their bread in peace, when they are hungry, and let Christ's poor dead body alone! But we are making some progress. In the darker ages, men never doubted for a moment that in the Eucharist the bread was changed into the body of Christ. The only question which troubled them was how it could at the same time preserve its color and shape. Once a serious dispute arose as to what might become of Christ's body, in case the bread happened to be burned, or eaten by a mouse. We have drifted into common sense so far that we begin to doubt the "Real Presence." Another century of drifting will make us doubt whether Christ's "spirit" is in any way mixed up with the dough that makes sacramental bread. Meantime, for the peace of the Episcopal brethren in Illinois, may they bear in mind the wise saying of Henry Grattan, that "it is the error of sects to value themselves more upon their differences than upon their religion." Yours truly,

TEXT-BOOK THEOLOGY.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I desire to send you some extracts from a book called Hitchcock's Anatomy and Physiology. It is a book somewhat extensively used in public schools, and is the regular text-book in at least one of the wards of Boston. In it there is a section thus headed: "Anatomy and Physiology furnish presumptive evidence that the world is in a fallen condition." The writer goes on to say:—

"There are evils connected with our physical condition such as we cannot suppose would exist in a paradisiacal state, and the inference is that these evils are best accounted for by the supposition that the world is adapted rather for a fallen than for a holy being. . . . Exasperated and maddened nerves produce the very climax of human anguish. But some other object besides awakening a salutary caution against evil must be in view by such suffering. Now we know that, as a matter of discipline for a depraved and sinful being, it is eminently salutary. It affords, therefore, a presumptive proof that such is man's character. Man's exposure to accidents and diseases which no human foresight can avoid leads to the same conclusion. . . . Why should he be so exposed under the government of a Being of Infinite Benevolence if there were not something in his character which demanded this severity of discipline? What can that be but an alienated, rebellious heart, which no milder means will subdue? . . . We cannot conceive the incidental evils in the world to be necessary in a world of perfect purity and happiness. But they are wisely adapted to a fallen being, and therefore the presumption is that man is in such a fallen state. The existence and universality of death lead to the same conclusion. It may indeed be made probable that, in such a state of things as the present, death is a blessing even to the inferior creatures. But it would not be so in an unfallen paradisiacal state. It is, however, a fit and probably an inevitable concomitant and consequence of sin. Where it is universal, therefore, the presumption is that it is a fallen state. . . . It is said that these arguments would prove the inferior animals, even those that lived long before man, to be in a fallen condition, since they both suffer and die. But the lower animals, not having a moral nature, cannot sin; but they may suffer in consequence of their connection with sinful man. The world, from the beginning, was adapted to him as a fallen being, and of course all other animals must be subject, like him, to suffering and death. This sympathy of all Nature with man's fallen condition is clearly taught in Revelation."

This section is near the end of the book, which was evidently written with such an end in view; and I wish to protest against giving to boys and girls, as the result of anatomical science, such musty relics of an obsolete theology. That such a text-book should be tolerated in the city of Boston, and in this year 1875, seems incredible; but such is the fact. Even an express disclaimer on the part of the teacher that such talk has anything to do with anatomy or physiology could not neutralize the evil effects of a book written in accordance with the ideas of past centuries. There is no reason to fear that students of anatomy who are old enough to apprehend the significance of what they read and see will derive any feelings but those of reverence and love for Him by whom their bodies have been so fearfully and wonderfully framed. But the fruit of the study of books like the one in question will as certainly be irreverence and contempt as wheat grows from wheat, fig from fig, and thistle from thistle. For instruction in what is true and rational a man or woman in after-life feels ever-increasing gratitude; but let us beware lest the next generation pronounce us to have been cumberers of the ground, and point at our work the finger of scorn.

Truly yours,
JAMAICA PLAIN, Feb. 22, 1875.

LABOR: THE EMPLOYER'S SIDE OF THE QUESTION.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 11, 1875.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I read with interest the article last week on labor by "A. W. S." I beg to present to you a few points. Labor, I believe, must be governed by the supply and the demand. When the various productive interests of the country are not active, labor is not in demand. At this time, as a rule, there is no margin for manufacturers, nor for railroads, even; therefore there are no improvements in that direction, and many are simply keeping their factories or mills running on part time to keep their hands together, wishing that a more prosperous time may soon arrive. This whole matter is governed mainly by the law of trade. When the profit is very large to manufacturers, they improve, build, etc. Largely then comes the over-production of goods, and frequently the loss will be equally as great as their profits have been, and this loss is frequently sustained by trying to keep all of the machinery moving—in part upon the principle that it is "better to wear out than to rust out." As you know, with individuals, using the facilities assists to preserve them. As to the question, again, which party has been the most arbitrary, please remember that the Trades Union dictated a few years ago to their employers that a limited number of apprentices only should be employed; and that wages were very remunerative, while business was good. I assure you, I feel great sympathy for the workingman, but I think there are two sides. At this moment manufacturers cannot help themselves, cannot sustain their mills or factories without a reduction in the wages. It is many times a question of life with them, and in trying to save themselves they save their laborers. The writer could name a party who advanced the wages of his employees without any solicitation on their part a few years ago, an increase which amounted to several thousand dollars per year; but now he hesitates very much about asking the reduction which seems inevitable. We never before experienced a panic after a long war. We shall all be wiser when we see the end. M.

DEATH OF AN "HONEST INFIDEL."

OSARK, Mo., Feb. 13, 1875.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

There has just occurred in this vicinity a very novel event—the death of an "infidel." H. W. Myers, an old gentleman who came from Michigan here a few years ago, and whose religious views were to this community shockingly sceptical, died in this county a short time since. As his death had been expected for several weeks during his painful illness, and as "infidels always renounce their dangerous views on their death-beds," the whole community was interested in his approaching end. But he did not retract his strange views, whatever they may have been, but died without manifesting any of the unbeliever's terrors. I was not personally acquainted with him, and do not know to what type of sceptics he belonged. He was an enigma in his religious belief to the Christian people here, and it is impossible to learn from them his real views, for they do not discriminate between the most mild and the most radical shades of scepticism. But they can discern and classify traits of character more accurately than philosophical beliefs, and all of those with whom I have talked on the subject agree in saying that he was a man of invincible integrity. A good citizen who knew him intimately told me that Mr. Myers was the most scrupulously honest man in his dealings he had ever met; and a worthy Christian lady told me that she would trust him in all relations involving moral integrity with more confidence than she would have in her Christian brethren.

He was a member of the orders of Patrons of Husbandry and Odd Fellows, and was buried by these orders with their respective honors. This is exciting considerable censure from the Christians outside these societies against their brethren and sisters who participated in the funeral. The former are urging their Christian friends to "let the dead bury their dead."

Yours truly,
H. CLAY NEVILLE.

"SACRED SONGS FOR CHILDREN."

HAVERHILL, Mass., Feb. 26, 1875.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

In your paper of February 18 I read a communication from "W. K. R.," of St. Paul, Minn., relating to "Sacred Songs for Children." Will you please, through THE INDEX, call his attention to a book entitled The Morning Stars? The authors are J. Vila Blake and lady. It is published by O. Ditson & Co., Boston, and C. H. Ditson & Co., New York. It is certainly free from "any taint of darkening creed or dogma." M. A. L.

WE ARE SORRY to learn that a German chemist has succeeded in making a first-rate brandy out of sawdust. We are a friend of the temperance movement, and we want it to succeed; but what chance will it have when a man can take a rip-saw and go out and get drunk with a fence-rail? What is the use of a prohibitory liquor law if a man is able to make brandy smashes out of the shingles on his roof, or if he can get delirium tremens by drinking the legs of his kitchen chairs? You may shut an inebriate out of a gin-shop, and keep him away from taverns, but if he can become uproarious on boiled sawdust and desiccated window-sills, any effort at reform must necessarily be a failure. It will be wise, therefore, if temperance societies will butcher the German chemist before he goes any further.—Dunn County (Tenn.) News.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, 10c per line.

 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, England.
 PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. ABBOT. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES FOR 1875.

The Committee of the Free Religious Association, in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons, again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below,—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged:—

REASONS FOR USING THE EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol.
8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published;
he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The New York TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying:
"It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

RADICAL LECTURES.

Having recently left the Church for the sake of freedom and truth, I am now ready to lecture on

LIBERAL SUBJECTS

to liberal people. I will speak on—

1. THE RELATION OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION.
2. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.
3. THE ANTAGONISM OF CHRISTIANITY TO CIVILIZATION.
4. THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

Other lectures also on interesting subjects.

I am willing to go West, if an engagement can be made for a sufficient number of lectures to make it an inducement; and to settle with any liberal society on terms mutually satisfactory.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———.

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

For List of Liberal Leagues, see next page.

GLIMPSES.

ABOUT $100,000,000 of property belonging to church corporations and clergymen are exempted from taxation in the State of New York.

THE gross receipts of the "Dumb Animals Fair" in this city were over $25,000, of which $22,000 or $23,000 are net. Everybody is pleased at this happy result.

A JOINT COMMITTEE of the Rhode Island Legislature is considering church exemption from taxation. Three hearings have been given, and a report favorable to the reform is expected.

IT IS REPORTED that Mr. Frothingham has been invited to preach in one of the liberal Jewish Synagogues of New York city. This is a new and pleasing indication of the decay of sectarian barriers.

A CADET in the Naval Academy at Annapolis has submitted to expulsion rather than fence with another cadet who has a dark skin. The silly fellow certainly cannot be accused of being "on the fence."

REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY is expected to revisit this country next autumn, to lecture on "London," "The Devil," and "Oriental Religion." The numerous admirers of this brilliant writer and preacher will give him a warm welcome.

THE DEATH of Sir Charles Lyell, on Washington's birthday, has called forth universally testimonials of profound respect for his moral worth as a man and his eminent scientific services as a geologist. He has been buried in Westminster Abbey, the highest honor that can be paid to a deceased Englishman.

THE young ass on which Jesus entered Jerusalem (according to a legend related by Scribner's Monthly), after various travels, crossed the Mediterranean dry-shod, took up his abode in Verona, died at a good old age, and was carried in annual procession at the "Festival of the Asses," which has now become a mere name. The Genoese secured his sacred tail, and kept it as a relic in the church of St. Dominic. And so this eminent donkey was "gathered to his fathers."

THE Popular Science Monthly for March contains a notice and a fine portrait of Dr. Henry Maudsley, whose Physiology and Pathology of the Mind is so widely and favorably known. Herbert Spencer has a paper on "The Genesis of Superstition," Professor Tyndall another on "The Atmosphere in Relation to Fog-Signalling," and Professor Huxley another on "Darwin and Haeckel." It is a remarkable fact that three such men should contribute to the same number of an American periodical.

MR. DEXTER A. HAWKINS, who lectured last Sunday before the Free Religious Association on "Our 'Sick Man,' and How to Cure Him: or the Educational Problem in the Cotton States," has very kindly given the use of his manuscript to THE INDEX, which will publish it in full next week. The lecture is a most valuable and instructive study of a question of surpassing public interest, and will undoubtedly command widespread attention by its wealth of statistical information and its sound practical wisdom.

THE Second Report of the Directors of the Newton Home for Orphan and Destitute Girls shows that this noble charity is gaining ground. Its receipts for the past year were $5,202.45, and its expenditures $4,278.50, leaving a balance of $923.95. Mrs. Pomroy's report as Superintendent is quite touching. She says one little boy had a "Pin Fair" for the Home, and forwarded three thousand pins as the proceeds! The Directors are Mrs. Daniel L. Furber, Miss Mary C. Shannon, and Mr. Nathaniel T. Allen, the latter two being good friends of THE INDEX, and doing their best to show that free religion means good-will to man, and poor orphan girls, too.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT, of this city, is endeavoring to secure the establishment of the "American Family Bank," which is intended to combine the features of a savings bank and an insurance company. This is a most excellent plan, and ought to receive the heartiest support of all real philanthropists. It is well known that the ordinary rates of life insurance are far higher than they need be; and it will be a service of incalculable value to the poor to enable them to insure their lives at the same time that they lay up their little earnings. Mr. Wright is a great authority on all insurance matters, as well as a most true and staunch friend of humanity; and THE INDEX has cause to know by experience how quick and warm his sympathies are towards every effort to hasten the "good time coming."

THE LONDON National Reformer of February 14 quotes the following paragraph from the Coöperative News concerning the sickness of Mr. G. J. Holyoake: "Mr. Holyoake's illness extended over a far longer period than was at first anticipated. After apparent recovery from the first attack, the loss of the power of seeing followed, and it is two months since he was able to read his letters or write. He trusts that many correspondents whose communications he has been obliged to lay aside will ascribe his seeming neglect to his disability. His publication of his history of coöperation in England has been less delayed than was expected under these circumstances. It is proceeding through the press, the proofs being read to Mr. Holyoake, and the revision found necessary being dictated by him. The work is in the hands of the Coöperative printers, whose progress would have been greater had not the manager himself unfortunately fallen ill; but he, we are glad to say, has now recovered." Mr. Holyoake's articles in THE INDEX have won him many new friends, who will join with us in hoping for his speedy recovery.

THE North Carolina House of Representatives, as we stated last week with imperfect knowledge of the facts, expelled from his seat in that body Mr. J. W. Thorne, member from Warren County, on February 25. Mr. Thorne is a Pennsylvania Quaker, about sixty-five years of age; and he was expelled by a resolution offered by Mr. Hanson Hughes, colored representative from Granville. This resolution, adopted by a vote of 46 to 31, was as follows:—

"WHEREAS, J. W. Thorne, the member from Warren County, has advocated and promulgated a most blasphemous doctrine, subversive of the principles of the Constitution of North Carolina and of sound morality; therefore,

"Resolved, That the said J. W. Thorne be, and he is hereby, expelled from a seat on this floor."

The New York Graphic of March 4 makes these pertinent remarks on this outrageous action: "The survival of the belief in Mumbo-Jumbo among many of the North Carolina legislators is quite marked, since the man with whom they refuse to associate because of his belief was no Atheist but a Quaker, who expressly told them that he believed in 'one living and true God; everlasting, without body, or parts, or passions; the maker of all things visible and invisible.' As this confession of faith was unsatisfactory, it is evident that the God believed in by the North Carolina legislators is some other sort of being—some fetish whose attributes their African ancestors never formulated with much care or in very attractive words. If the example thus set should be followed in more civilized portions of the Union, legislatures could not convene, as it would be almost impossible to find in an enlightened community men who, believing in God, could state their faith in terms very different from those used by Mr. Thorne. It is a pity that any legislature could be brought to stultify itself by such action as this, which ejects from his seat a good, competent, and conscientious man not politically disqualified to hold it."

Morality.

AN ESSAY READ BEFORE THE "MORAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION," BOSTON, JAN. 8, 1875.

BY A. W. STEVENS.

Amidst all our talk about morality, and of educating people to be moral, it would be well if we could get some clear and well-defined judgment as to what morality really is.

There are at least two kinds of morality,—essential and conventional; or, personal and social. That is essentially moral to me, which I can allow to myself; which my own moral sense permits and sanctions. That is conventionally moral to me, which society permits me to do, and covers me with its protection in doing. This brief preliminary statement, perhaps, may open up to us a clearer perception of, and flash a flood of light upon, the whole subject which we have to consider.

Some of the old foundations of morality are already crumbling to decay, and some of those more modern are likely to follow in the same way. In the first place, we have the theological basis of morality, which long held sway in the past, but which cannot survive the rise and growth of rationalism. "The chief duty of man," says the old theology, "is to glorify God, and keep his commandments." But what if there be no God? His existence, as formerly held to, is now quite an open question among all who think undogmatically. All the methods of finding out and believing in God have undergone great and radical change since science has been able to get a firm foothold in the world. The Deity which the most enlightened people now believe in is of a very different kind from that which the theologians pointed out. He is a God who may be said to be concerned in minding the great affairs of the universe, without self-reference. All the glorifying which he commands or desires us to do is a glorifying of ourselves, not of him. He is a Deity whose only interest in us is to give us, in the long run, the best possible chance to grow and to perfect our human nature. The highest duty which he makes us conscious of is the duty we owe to ourselves,—the duty to take our nature just as he gives it to us, and to make the most of it in every way. The only divine laws which exist are as natural as they are divine, and no more binding upon man than upon God himself. We can break one of them as easily as he can; and yet neither he nor we can so much as obstruct or impair one of them for a single instant. They are laws which knit the universe in the first instance, and now hold it together as a firm and enduring fabric; they are laws which thread the being of God and every soul of man together, and make divinity and humanity out of the same pattern, and show them to be of one substance.

Theology, then, is no true basis of morality. The God which the theologians discovered is a myth. There is no such God; he has faded out in the light of science and common sense, as the ghostly visions of a distempered night vanish in the dawning of a sane and wholesome day. No more do we hear his voice calling upon us to obey him and keep his commandments; but we take the law of duty from our own conscience and moral sense. No more do we heed his jealous exaction to consider his glory the chief end of our mission to perpetuate and enhance; but with newly-awakened and hourly-increasing self-respect we give ourselves to the work of improving and developing our own humanity, keeping our eyes on no higher end than the perfectibility of our human lives. The only God left to us is one whose greatness we can neither make nor mar, whose grandeur we can neither diminish nor augment. He is so allied to us by nature, that his being is glorified by us only as we glorify ourselves. In just that degree to which we round out and perfect our own souls, we evolve his fairest image from our likeness; we enthroned him in our thought as the supreme ideal of our own potential attainment. The duty, therefore, which we have been said to owe to God is superseded by that which we find we owe to ourselves; and, so far, we are driven to seek some other basis for morality than that which theology can offer.

But now steps in the State, and demands our allegiance. The king comes in the place of God, and says to us, "Obey me; subject yourselves to my will; conform your lives to my law,—and you shall be accounted moral." Historically and logically, the divine right of the king to govern us is next in order to the divine right of God to command us. "The king can do no wrong," it is said; therefore those who obey him must be in the right. The king is the State; and the State, it is claimed, is the collected and embodied wisdom of the wisest. Hence from them the many should receive the law, and take the maxims of government. The unauthorized and unanointed individual, it was thought, could not know or determine his rights and duties; only those who had, or claimed to have, the appointment and sanction of Heaven could properly expound and prescribe to him what was moral.

This divine right of the king to regulate the conduct of men, and give the ethical standard, the New World at least has quite departed from. In this country, the king became a myth even before the theological Deity did. His existence was denied; and his heavenly appointment to interfere with the consciences of men was treated with derision. The idea of kingship as the foundation of government and morals was declared to be obsolete, and the whole matter of making right rules of conduct was referred to the people, where it was said properly to belong.

And yet, though the king was dethroned, the principle of authority was not. Moral allegiance to the crowned head of one man passed to the crowned heads of the majority. The king was denied to be the State, but the State was declared to be king. Men's consciences were emancipated from the mere ipse dixit of royalty, but they were still tightly held in the hands of the popular legislature. The statute book upheld the Ten Commandments, and gave them efficient force over the conduct of men. Indeed, the statute book was, to all intents and purposes, the moral code for the people. Did any man wish to vote for another to be Governor,—then his name must be found on the roll of some church membership. Did any man himself aspire to be Governor; or did he wish only to testify in the courts,—then he must believe in God, and take the oath in the name of Deity. Did any father of a family wish to take his wife and children to a pleasure-ride on Sunday,—then he was subject to arrest, and to pay a fine and costs. Did any free-thinker dissent from all the creeds and teachings of all the churches, and prefer to do his worshipping in the green fields or groves, instead of any dedicated Meeting House,—still, all the same, must he contribute to the support of "gospel preaching," and pay a tax to maintain the religion of other men.

Much progress has been made from the point where our Puritan fathers tried to fix the standard of morality. We have improved upon them in many respects, and made their standard less rigid and demanding. Nevertheless, while there is far more freedom in general practice, in theory we still adhere to the same old principle of authority, especially in ethical matters. Still we make the basis of morality to be external: we seek for it in law rather than in conscience. Still we judge a man to be moral more by what he does than by what he is; more by his conformity to the requirements and usages of society, than by his religious devotion to the call of his own nature. Much emancipated as we are, in these latter days, from the old Puritan theology, we are greatly less emancipated from the Puritan notions of morality. Politically, we have risen very near to the idea that every man is his own king; he may vote for whom he pleases, against whom he pleases, or vote not at all. But we have not yet brought ourselves to own that that man is the most moral man who obeys the law of his own conscience, without regard to conventional custom or the letter of the penal code. Somehow, we seem still to think that institutions are more to be trusted than men; that the voice of the legislature is more sacred than the voice of the soul. We expect society to make the individual moral, by laws and by penalties, instead of putting our first faith in the moral nature of the individual himself, and its eternal tendency to develop into rectitude. We aim at producing social morality rather than personal; being satisfied to secure outward order and peace, without inquiring if the private conscience be interiorly enlightened and essentially improved.

Now, beyond all question, social morality is an object we have to aim at and provide for. As individuals, we are not only units but integers; we are parts of one great whole. A collection of individuals makes a society. Society implies social relations; and social relations imply social duties. Individually, we owe something to every other individual; and, more than that, we owe something to the whole community of individuals. If the individual is a unit, so is society a unit; and its unitary interests cannot be imperilled without imperilling the interests of each individual. The individual, therefore, must protect society. He must protect its right to exist, and to exist harmoniously and peacefully. He must protect it against himself, against his own selfishness; and when he wrongs it he must make amends to it: he must restore to it whatever he has wrongfully taken from it.

Just this, then, the individual owes to society: he owes it respect. He is bound to guard its rights, for its rights are the collective rights of all. If he disturbs the real order and harmony of society, he disturbs himself. If he violates its true peace, he so far parts with his own peace. The individual is so related to the whole community, that he cannot wrong it without wronging himself. The commonweal includes his weal; his destiny is wrapped up in the destiny of all. Social morality, therefore, is something which the individual has to care for and cultivate. As a social being he cannot dispense with it; he can no more ignore his social duties than he can ignore his social relations. And his social relations he no more can ignore than himself; for the individual exists as a social being. Destroy society, and you destroy him.

But, if the individual is interested in promoting social morality, far more is society interested in promoting personal morality in him. Without personal morality there can be no such thing as social morality. The only basis of the latter is the former; and the only basis of personal morality is the person himself. In nothing external to him is that basis; but in his own soul, his own nature, his own being, forever is it to be found. Really, there is nothing so great as the individual. In naught else does Deity delight so much; for in personal man God recognizes himself, as in turn man recognizes his perfected self in God. For the individual society primarily exists; it is his home, his arena, his means of progress. At best, it can only be a shelter for him while yet he is defenceless; it can only cradle him in his infancy, and nurse him while he is young, and save him from that harm which indiscretion and premature exposure might bring on him, and then teach him to depend upon himself and refer to his own resources. Let not society be so vain as to think it is worthy to be the permanent master or keeper of the individual, or to be sought else than his temporary tutor and helper. Let it not presume to create the law for him, but only to help him find it and read it in his own nature, as it is there written by the hand of the Almighty. On pain of incalculable sorrow to itself will society sacrifice man, or any true part of him, to any one of its institutions, its laws, its customs, its fashions; or hinder him from seeking in freedom whatever his mature soul craves. As no wise parent will flog his child to school, but only incite and help him to go there, so, if it be wise, society will never undertake to compel men to be moral after its own notion, but will offer them every inducement and assistance to be moral according to their own individual standard. For each man has his standard of morality, and shall he be forced to accept another's? Shall he be expected to pass by what his own soul says, and listen submissively to what another soul may say? The high importance of man's being moral rests primarily, not in the fact of his existing as a social creature, having social relations and experiencing social necessities, but in the fact that there have been given to his soul an infinite significance and scope. Not that I may live esteemed as a moral man by society, and receive its graceful benediction when I die, not that my neighbors may enjoy their cakes and ale in peace, and suffer me to do the same, am I called upon to cultivate the virtues possible to my native capacity; but rather because I have a divine life to unfold, and to clothe it with "the manners of the skies." Sounding in the depths of my soul I hear a call to come up higher, to lift my whole finite nature into the breadth of infinitude; I see a finger from afar beckoning me onward, and pointing to the goal of perfection,—and this it is which incites me to strive to the uttermost, and bedeck myself with every moral and spiritual grace, that I may sit at last unshamed among the gods, and move in heavenly society without a tell-tale blush or an awkward gesture. So far as society can help me to do this, I will be thankful; but I live my life for nobler purposes, than to secure its favor or escape its censure.

It is a matter of history as well as of daily observation, that the judgment as to what is moral and what immoral varies according to circumstances. It is impossible to make the standard of morality absolute and uniform. Society legislates and administers in vain to do this. No system of police can accomplish it, though a constable of the State should be stationed at the door of every private residence, or detailed to walk with every individual citizen. To effect it, human nature itself would have to be made over, and all men run in the same unvarying mould. As it is, moral judgments differ as inevitably as intellectual judgments. A variety of moral tastes, selections, and appropriations is as unavoidable as the same result in the realm where the physical senses operate. What one demands, another rejects; what one is capable of receiving with pleasure and profit, another passes by with indifference or disgust. This matter is wholly decided by individual organization and external environment. Not only heredity but climate and soil come in to determine it. That moral code which, in some respects, suits very well a people living in the tropics, might, in the same particulars, be entirely unsuited to another living in a temperate or a frigid zone. So a tropical nature, wherever geographically climated, must be admitted to have necessities—at least desires, aptitudes, and affiliations—which differentiate it, and submit it to be differently judged, from a nature which is phlegmatic, torpid, and cold. No scientific ethics ever can be formulated so as to endure, which does not take into account all those causes that produce the moral varieties well known to exist in the human species; which does not summon into court every witness from every actual condition and circumstance of human experience, and take its free, unembarrassed, and ungarbled testimony as to all the facts bearing upon this subject. And when we have done our best to investigate this whole matter, and to demonstrate the universal rules of morality, we shall find that we have still to confront the various phenomena that will be sure to continue to occur, and to deal with differing cases that will arise to test our largest charity and our finest wisdom. Still we shall find that we have not obliterated the fundamental difference between conventional and essential morality,—that morality which is the offspring of social agreement and regulation, of public opinion, and that which comes from natural capacity and selection; from the deepest instincts and most unspotted genius of the personal soul. Not until society learns how rightly to deal with the individual, to put itself into sympathetic instead of antagonistic relations with him, to attempt no despotic but only an educative influence over him; not until it learns to read and appreciate his nature generously and fairly, ceasing by any means the effort to crush it, but helping him to protect himself against its fierceness and to unfold its sweetness; not until society itself perceives, and makes the individual see, that all his interests are identical with its own, and that they cannot be advanced separately but best together,—not until this charming period of mutual good understanding and amity comes to pass between society and the individual, shall we have a complete blending of social and personal morality; a beautiful adjustment and harmony of the inward and outward life of man.

A REPLY TO MR. ABBOT.

BY REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

But, in the meantime, society and the individual must go on learning, each in its own way, as best they can; hoping for as little jar between them as possible. One thing we all must learn; which is that morality is not mere prudence. It is not a negative but a positive thing. It does not consist in avoiding, but in becoming; not in safety, but in venture. Do you think to keep yourself warm and well, by crouching in the chimney-corner, and avoiding the stinging air outside and the roaring blast which rattles your windows? If you are sensible, you will dare the out-door weather; you will work or play in the frost and cold; you will come and go on your needful errands, unfearing the elements that challenge all your might and skill,—and so you shall be warm with the fire of life within you; you shall glow all through with the ardor of your robust will and dauntless energies. Do you think to make progress in the truth, if you are afraid of your doubts, and shrink with terror from your scepticism? Only by bravely facing every mental difficulty shall you gain strength to overcome it; only by trusting truth to lead you, and your own capacity to follow it, shall you gain any step in knowledge, or grow at all in wisdom.

The same fearless spirit of trust is necessary in the process of developing our moral nature. Do I think to make myself morally safe by a system of constant repression and prohibition, by never sallying forth with my desires to see if they are bent on good or evil? Is cowardice, then, the bottom virtue? Must I forever walk this world a slave to fear? Shall I duck and dodge, and start and tremble, expecting every road-side bush to blaze with a devil rather than a god? Of what am I afraid? Am I not in God's world; is He not here; and shall I be afraid to walk where His footsteps fall? Is it myself I fear? Then, indeed, am I defenceless; and straightway let me go and find a keeper! Do I fear others? My very fear of them tempts them to harm me, and makes me vulnerable to their least hurtful skill. No: I must live on trust, not suspicion; on courage, not on fear, if I would have the cheek of my moral nature bloom with the ruddy hue of health. I must let my life live itself out in gladness and in freedom; and, as the artless child wins all hearts with its spontaneous and boundless power of trusting, so my life must be such a simple act of faith as will disarm every circumstance of skill to hurt me, as will take me through the red-hot furnace of any experience without the smell of fire upon my garments, as will enable me to handle the scorpion evils of society without receiving a single poisonous sting. Let us launch out and trust the soul of good, and we shall find that we conquer as we go; that we enlarge the quantity of our experience without degrading, but much improving, its quality. Let us not be so foolish as to think that, if we keep out of the hands of the police, we are moral; for those shrewd guardians of social morality make sad mistakes sometimes, arresting such as sin least, and allowing the greatest sinners to escape altogether. Neither must we think that, because we conform to things as they are, we are moral; possibly by non-conforming in some instances we should prove our better morality. In all ages, there have been some souls too great and too pure to obey society's law; in order to be personally moral, they have had to break the law of social morality. In daring something for God, they had to offend man.

Let us know that morality is not a letter, but a spirit; that it is not the form of obedience, but the mind of obedience. I think we are most moral when we are thinking least about being so. Some persons give themselves the dyspepsia by worrying about what food is fit to eat; but if they would eat not too much, nor too little, and eat regularly, they might indulge themselves in almost any kind of food or drink. So it is with some who want to be moral, but are afraid they shall not be; they do, indeed, fail to be moral, because they are so conscious of their desire to be. They make themselves moral dyspeptics by their moral worry. Many a good-meaning soul has tortured itself in this way, and has made duty, not a beauty, but an ugly deformity which men have looked at sorrowfully. But the truth is, that conscience was not given us to trouble us, any more than the liver was; both will make us happy, if we will not be asking too much of them, or giving them too much attention.

Indulging ourselves in what is called remorse, or repentance, is a very poor way of improving our moral nature. We really cannot afford such a spiritual pastime; it is a waste of precious hours and strength which we need for more glorious occupations. What can it avail us to dwell mournfully upon the sins and follies of the past? It is not the sign of a keen moral sense to do so, but rather of an exaggerated and morbid one. Everything in our past is part and parcel of that process of evolution from which neither we nor any creature can escape. It is so much garnered experience designed to enrich us in mind and heart, if only we can produce a true rationale of it, and not a mere representation which shall only serve to scare us out of our present senses. Does Nature lament over her roughness, her wildness, and her fierceness,—her ichthyosaurian and reptilian periods? She scans with sane vision the whole long line, from the snake that crawls upon his belly in the slime to the man that walks upright with his face to the heavens; and she sees significance and orderly procession in every stage of development, and rejoices in the glorious outcome! It only needs that we should be equally sensible (and scientific, if you please) in reviewing our past lives, to come to an equally cheerful conclusion respecting our moral evolution. We must have a thorough respect for ourselves just as we are, with all that we have brought off with us and in us from the field of our past experience. We must know that we are sinning when we think we are, and never at any other time. We must go straight on, obeying the divine impulse of each new moment; and if at any time we find we have done wrong, then let us forget it as soon as may be in doing right.

Morality is order, regularity, keeping things in their right place. Dirt is matter out of place, it is said; so immorality is something done out of season, without due regard to relations. Everything is moral to the soul that is moral. No act is immoral unless the doer is immoral. Is Nature wicked in her thunder and lightning, her storm and whirlwind, her earthquake and volcano, her parching heat and freezing cold, her stinging adder and poisonous wasp? She is really as beneficent and well-disposed in all these as in her gentle sunshine and rain, her calm nights and summer flowers. There are some souls who, like Nature, can never sin because they have not the sinful mind; because their spirits are of love, not of hate—of construction, not destruction. They moralize everything they do, and are demoralized by nothing. Their interior morality shines through their whole personality, and softens, modifies, and sublimates their outward acts,—as the sun shining from behind the storm gilds the thunder-cloud, and makes its raindrops brilliants in the bow that spans the sky.

In trying to reform a class of persons, we should not go to them and begin by telling them that they must do this or must not do that, because this is moral and that is immoral. Rather let us first seek to know what their own idea of morality is, and whether what they are doing seems right to them, however otherwise it seems to us. For be it remembered that we have no more right to impose on others our morality, than to impose on them our theology, or our philosophy. So long as they respect our rights, they have their right to do what they please as well as to believe what they please. Every class of persons has its own standard of orthodoxy in ethics no less than in religion; and the only liberal office which we have towards them is the same which they have towards us,—that of persuasion, not of compulsion. This is the last and perhaps the hardest lesson which radicals have to learn: to be liberal in their moral and social as well as in their religious and theological judgments. We never can be successful in reforming thoroughly any class of persons, until we learn to go among them without the spirit of condemnation, which is ever the spirit of narrowness and of dogmatism. In order to judge them fairly, or do them any real good, we must, if possible, get their stand-point, understand their circumstances, appreciate their motives, and do justice to their natures. And we must know that, if we would move any of our fellow-beings up in the moral scale, we must move up their ideas, their wants, their aspirations; in short, their whole mental and moral outlook. We must increase their self-respect. We must educate them out of one standard into another. Then, just as they outgrow the ill-fitting clothes of their bodies, so they will outgrow whatever ill-befits their souls.

WE DO NOT expect by secularizing the schools to avert the hostility of the Catholic hierarchy, who are determined, like some Protestants, to be satisfied with nothing short of complete control in educational affairs. But, notwithstanding their active opposition, there is still a vast multitude of Catholic children in our schools, kept there sometimes under protest. There is a vast body of the Catholic laity, who are so far Americanized that the denunciations of the priests, who are mostly of foreign birth, would have little influence over them, except for the allegation that the schools are under Protestant control, and used for the purpose of alienating Catholic children from the faith. We wish to take this argument out of the mouths of the priests, and to let American Catholics see that they can send their children to the schools without exposing them to immoral influences on the one hand or to Protestant teaching on the other. Placing the schools on this ground of equal and exact justice, we shall have a right to appeal to every class of citizens to support them.—Christian Union.

THE FLAG OF THE REFORM CLUB of Neufchatel, in Switzerland, bears the following inscription: "A church without priests, religion without catechism, the Divine creed without mystery, morality without theology, and God without system."

At the outset of my article, and of my first appearance in THE INDEX, I wish to thank the editor for the fairness, kindness, and candor with which he met my attack upon his position. Judging by the ordinary theological method, I may as well confess, I was a little surprised at it. If all who claim to bow to the spirit and "sweet reasonableness" of Jesus would only show as just and truth-seeking a temper, "the kingdom of God" would more speedily appear. I will try to imitate him in my reply; and I assure him that, though in this regard I become his "disciple," and take him for "master," I shall not thereby surrender one atom of my individuality or freedom.

I also wish to thank the editor for the expression of his confidence in my honesty. And I fear not to say freely, to him and to all the world, that I cannot understand the position of any man who claims to be honest, and who, at the same time, is not desirous of finding and accepting the simple truth. If this takes him out of Christianity, let him go. If it takes him into materialism, let him go. If he knows not where he is going, still let him go,—for he who is so true to his moral convictions that he follows them, though, like Abraham, "he goes out, not knowing whither," he is the man, and the only man, who is safe.

The position I at present occupy, then, is not the result of any foregone conclusions. So far as I can see, it seems to me not only consistent with, but supported by, both freedom and the scientific method. Let us look at it a little, and see.

I must skip the many inviting but scattered points that suggest themselves, and come at once to the main issue.

The whole question involved in this discussion I take to be this: Are freedom and Christianity consistent? Or, to state it in another way, Can a man be free, and at the same time wear the name of Christian, and in any real sense acknowledge the authority of Jesus? My answer is an emphatic yes. Mr. Abbot says no, in the supposed interest of freedom. Orthodoxy and some Unitarians say no, in the supposed interest of Christianity. I say, Freedom, and do not believe Christianity is in danger. I also say, Christianity, and do not believe freedom is in danger.

The question divides itself in two: What is freedom? and what do we mean by the authority of Jesus? Take them in their order.

1. What, then, is freedom?

Most questions could be settled by a right use of the dictionary, and by antagonists taking pains to understand each other. But perhaps more than half the controversies are carried on after the following fashion: "The house of which I am speaking is red." To which the other makes answer: "I am compelled to say that, when my opponent calls the house green, he shows himself an egregious ass, or else he deliberately tells a falsehood." Mr. Tyndall talks about matter and materialism, and means one thing. The newspapers and magazines catch it up, and deride, and taunt, and call names,—it being all the while apparent to the calm looker-on that they are talking about another and an entirely different thing. Mr. Abbot calls himself anti-Christian. And then some good Unitarian, who doesn't believe in what Mr. Abbot calls Christianity a whit more than he does, lifts up his hands in astonishment and horror. He is struck dumb,—because Mr. Abbot doesn't call things by the same name he does.

Just this misuse of the dictionary, in regard to the word freedom, seems to me to be one grand mistake of Mr. Abbot. I have been a careful reader of THE INDEX now for some time; and, if I can understand him, that which the editor calls freedom has no existence outside his own imagination. I deliberately and simply mean just that.

In the fervor of my discussion I used the word "absolute freedom"; and, in his definition of the fundamental principle of Free Religion, Mr. Abbot has followed my example, and used the same terms. But careful thought will convince him, as it has me, that there is no such thing in the universe. Mr. Abbot is bound by the laws of his own physical being. He is not free to eat poison and live. He is not free to walk on his head, or swim the sea like a fish, or fly the air like a bird. He is not free to be six inches taller than he is, nor to weigh fifty pounds more. Freedom from these restrictions would be freedom to enter the realms of nonentity—if he can tell where they are. He is also bound by the laws or conditions of his intellectual being. He is not free to be a poet like Shakspeare, or an artist like Flaxman, unless (which I do not presume to know) Nature has endowed him with the capacity. And these very capacities of which we speak, and which constitute a man's greatness and glory, are bounds and conditions of his being.

Neither is Mr. Abbot "absolutely" free in his moral life. He is not free to do a mean or dishonest act. When Jesus said, "God cannot be tempted of evil," or when Washington said, "I cannot tell a lie," there was a distinct denial made of "absolute" freedom. For God himself must be bound forever by his own perfect ideas of right,—the everlasting and unchanging constitution of his own being. On this one basis—"with him is no variableness or shadow of turning"—we build all morality, all law, all stability in civilization, all art, all science, the possibility of all knowledge; and yet, so long as God is even self-bound by the laws of right and order, he is not "absolutely free."

Whatever exists exists by virtue of those laws or forces which constitute and condition it; and whatever is not constituted or conditioned—either by itself, or by some outside power—does not fall within our conception of existence at all.

We may as well stop talking, then, of "absolute freedom"; or else let it be understood that we use the word interchangeably with nonentity.

But perfect freedom I still believe in, and still believe it to be consistent with Christianity. Let us see what it is. How will this do for a definition? Freedom is the liberty of following what seem to one reasonable courses of thought and conduct, without external compulsion or restraint. Of course this definition excepts insane men and criminals; and of course it is limited by a recognition of the equal liberty of others, who on all sides hedge us round and condition our life.

Now not only is "absolute" freedom negated by laws and conditions of physical and mental organization (even by life itself, for the man who lives isn't free to be dead at the same time), but a limitation is necessitated by the prevailing purpose or leading idea of a man's life. If a man wills to move, he isn't free to stand still at the same time. If he wills to go north, he isn't free to go south at the same time. If he wills to become a great lawyer, he is not free to study theology at the same time. If a man, in the exercise of his reason, decides that he must be a Republican in politics, he is not free at the same time to be a Democrat. Mr. Abbot doesn't think he limits his own freedom because he doesn't choose to defend the "White Leagues" on the same page that contains a denunciation of their policy. A man with a conviction or a purpose, then, is limited and led by that conviction or purpose.

The Free Religious Association is itself limited by its own idea. It is a "World's Fair," or "Universal Exposition," or "World's Congress" of religions. I am glad it exists. I am perfectly free to stand upon its platform with my Christianity; and if my Christianity suffers by the comparison, or is proved inferior or untrue, I will unconditionally surrender, and follow the truth. Now, so long as this Association exists, it is limited by the necessity of being itself. It is not free to become a political organization, or a pomological society, except as it is free to cease to exist; and if, beside being a member of this, a man chooses also to join the Social Science Association, he does not thereby limit his freedom. Can one not be a man, and an American, and a merchant, all at the same time, without surrendering his freedom in either capacity?

Now, after these definitions, I reassert that, as a Unitarian, I claim and intend to exercise perfect "liberty of thought and expression,"—"all the liberty that is claimed by the Free Religious platform."

Mr. Abbot asks: "When has any such freedom even been verbally affirmed by any Unitarian body?" I answer only for myself; but I say, I recognize no Unitarian body that has any right or business to assume the superfluous prerogative of telling me I am free. I am, and intend to be. To say, "You may" implies the right to say, "You may not." At least, Unitarians recognize no form of words that deny freedom.

He asks again: "Can any Unitarian organization say as much?" as that "Christians, Extra-Christians, Anti-Christians, Jews and Infidels, Theists and Atheists, Materialists and Spiritualists, Orthodox and Heterodox, may be enrolled on the list of membership without any inquiry as to their belief?" I reply, For all I know, all these shades of belief are represented on the voting list of my church. If not, they may be by buying a pew. But if the question be asked of any Unitarian conference or benevolent organization, I answer No. But saying no is only another way of saying that there is no Unitarian body which is the Free Religious Association. These organizations are free; and men do not freely associate themselves for the purpose of saying or doing what they do not believe, nor wish to do.

As to whether a man can occupy a Unitarian pulpit without tying himself to some foreign Unitarian creed that shall limit his freedom, I may be at liberty to say that I was called from an Orthodox pulpit to a Unitarian one on the basis of a distinct avowal that I must have a perfectly free platform, on which I should be at liberty to say just what seemed to me true; and my successor has gone to my Chicago pulpit on precisely the same understanding.

As to whether one may be allowed to stay in a Unitarian pulpit "who publicly denies that Jesus is the Christ in any sense," I should say this: The word "Christ" is only the Greek for "Messiah," and the word "Messiah" only means "anointed"; and students of the Old Testament are acquainted with the fact that the term was applied to any one who was anointed and set apart to a special work. In Isaiah, xlv. 1, it reads: "Thus saith the Lord to his anointed (his Messiah, his Christ)—to Cyrus." Thus in Bible usage a heathen king could be a Messiah, a Christ, when set apart to some special work. I presume all Unitarians hold that Jesus was "Christ" in this sense. He was the Messiah of the Jews, in the sense that he filled, or better than filled, the ideal of their hopes. I know of no proof that ever Paul held him to be Christ in any other than this latter sense; and I fail to see how either holding or denying this should touch the matter of one's religious freedom.

I find I have left little room for my other point; but I will now at least outline it, and ask—

II. What is meant by the authority of Jesus?

Speaking for myself alone, I wish to say very distinctly that I hold to it. But in what sense? and does the sense in which I hold it conflict with my freedom?

There are two kinds of authority: one is of force without regard to reason; the other is the authority of the force that inheres in the reason. The latter is the only authority that is legitimate, and this very word legitimate carries the whole thing in itself.

That which is legitimate is to be accepted and obeyed.

Mr. Abbot would hardly doubt or deny the authority of apparent truth. The known laws of body and mind, and social health, and political life, these are the highest kind of authority. No man is free from these. Or, rather, he is free in and because of these.

It is not the logic of Unitarianism to say that whatever and all that Jesus said is true, and to be accepted because he said it. Even God's saying a thing would not make it true. We only feel the strongest of all confidences that he never will and never can say anything that is not true. We recognize the authority of Jesus, then, only in so far as what he says is true, and because it is true; and he is the greatest authority of earth to us, because of our conviction that he has spoken more and higher spiritual and living truth than any other. It would have been just as true if somebody else had said it; but somebody else did not. The "life-impulse he gave the world" would have been just as much life and just as good had somebody else given it; but somebody else did not give it. Thus we bow to the authority of Jesus in so far as he seems to us the embodiment and utterance of God's eternal truth.

Will Mr. Abbot claim that he is free from such an authority as that? He may not believe in so much of life and truth in Jesus as most Unitarians hold to; but he will hardly say that he is free to disregard so much as he does recognize and believe.

To recognize and bow to the authority of truth—whether in or out of Jesus—is not only consistent with freedom, it is necessary to freedom not only, but even to existence. He who disregards the authority of the laws of life must die. Any liberty that ignores this is the liberty to not be.

Such a liberty and such an authority as I have sketched are the only ones that I can conceive of as consistent with individual existence and practical life. No more can the Free Religious Association bestow; as much do I already possess and exercise as a Liberal Christian.

With Mr. Abbot's permission, I will give at another time some reasons why I believe essential Christianity to be the eternal religion of humanity,—consistent not only with its freedom, but capable of lifting it to its highest life.

THE PROGRESS OF FREE-THOUGHT.

AN EXTRACT FROM AN ADDRESS AT THE DEDICATION OF PAINE MEMORIAL BUILDING, JAN. 29, 1875.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Now, I say, if free-thinkers will present their views courteously, if they will avoid mere declamation and vituperation, if they will maintain the character of gentlemen, and keep up the spirit of the age,—I say (and my experience has been as wide, perhaps, as that of any public lecturer throughout the country) they can go before an audience in any city of the United States, in any town or hamlet, and advocate their views with impunity. They may avow the most radical sentiments, I do not care if it is free-loveism itself, if it is done in a spirit and manner that shall not excite combativeness by its very rudeness; and I believe they will receive respectful attention anywhere in the United States.

I have no sympathy, therefore, with those remarks which were made this afternoon to the effect that we are living to-day in the midst of an intolerance which is comparable in its intensity with the intolerance of the days of Thomas Paine. I believe, nay, I may say I know, that we have made great advancement, not only in our views, but in the manner in which those views are treated by the great mass of Christians themselves. In the first place, the creeds have been pulverized; they have been utterly discredited. You can go into the pulpits to-day, and listen to sentiments that are so thoroughly radical that you are surprised that they come from a Christian minister. You can go into the pews, and hear there the expression of liberal and heterodox sentiments which are utterly inconsistent with the creeds and dogmas of the Church. You can examine the newspapers, from Maine to Oregon, and see evidences of liberality such as you have never seen before. The press reflects, as a rule, the general sentiments of the people; it is really an index of it. There are a few papers, among which I am proud to mention the Investigator, the Index, the Truth Seeker, and the Banner of Light, which are in advance of the religious sentiments of the age; but the great mass of the daily papers do not attempt to lead public opinion. If the editors of these papers are free-thinkers themselves, they suppress their sentiments, and simply attempt to express the views of the common people. I have a wide acquaintance with the editors of this country, and I think I may say with certainty that as a class they are sufficiently infidel. They are free-thinkers, and have no sympathy whatever with the dogmas of the popular religion; or with the general superstitions of the country; but looking upon them as the nominal faith of the country, in deference to the wishes of the people, they avoid attacking them with violence; at the same time, they give them a sufficient number of thrusts to show their general position and their general wish.

We see evidence of this advance, also, in the general literature of the country. Take up any of our magazines, and see what a change has taken place in this respect. It is not more than eighteen years since Oliver Wendell Holmes, of your city, published the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table in the Atlantic Monthly. That was a serial that was exceedingly mild in its heterodoxy, judged from the stand-point of modern thought to-day; and yet for that he was severely censured, and the religious press of the country said it would be impossible for the Atlantic Monthly to obtain a circulation when such a man as Oliver Wendell Holmes was allowed to contribute to its pages such heterodoxy as that. But the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table would be milk-and-water to the liberals of to-day, it is so mild in its heterodoxy. Gerrit Smith, whose death has just been announced, to the grief of so many millions of people, paid Horace Greeley, himself a heterodox and liberal-hearted man, thirteen hundred dollars for the publication of one of his sermons in the Tribune, and Mr. Greeley took especial pains in a leaded editorial to call attention to the fact that that sermon was not published as a communication, but as an advertisement. But since then, the Tribune has been glad not only to print the mild heterodoxy of Gerrit Smith, but to accept the writings of such men as O. B. Frothingham, Mr. F. E. Abbot, Mr. Higginson, and others who go as far or farther than they, and to send them broadcast among the people. Glad to get them, not simply because the editors of that paper were perhaps in sympathy with our views, but because they knew that there was such a large liberal element all over the country that it would make a demand for their paper, and increase their circulation. Go to the city of Chicago, the Queen City of the West, and you will find that if a free-thinker speaks from the platform like this on Sunday, he wakes up on Monday morning, and sees his speech reported verbatim in the daily papers, side by side with the speeches of the clergymen of the city. And this is done, not simply because they may be in sympathy with the opinions of free-thinkers, but because they know from experience that that is requisite in order to enlarge the circulation of their papers, and make them popular among the people. The papers that have the largest circulation in the West are those that give the most space to free-thought sentiments and to the most advanced views. Is not this an indication of the progress of liberalism, and a most significant indication, too?

Then, again, look at the publishing houses of this country. The Appletons are, if I mistake not, a Methodist house, but they do not hesitate to bring out the works of such men as Tyndall, Huxley, and Darwin; and we find some of the most thoroughly heterodox works brought out by those houses that have been supposed to be Orthodox. They do it, as I have said in regard to the papers, not because they are in sympathy personally with the views of these writers, but because they know there is a demand for this kind of reading, and that is the way to enlarge and increase their business.

When we see these facts, when we see the writings of such men as Huxley, and Darwin, and Tyndall, and Spencer, and Lewes, circulated broadcast, having a larger circulation than Orthodox literature, it is a pretty good indication that free thought is advancing. And, more than that, I can state from personal observation, that there are cities and towns throughout the Western country, where free-thought is the predominant sentiment, and where, if I were a policy man, and wished to establish myself in business, and wished to get the good will of the community, I would rather announce myself as an Infidel than as a Christian, because that is the public sentiment of the place.

Then I see liberalism in the attitude of the clergy. None of the clergy teach now what they did a hundred years ago,—that God took little infants from the breasts of their mothers, and sent them spurling down into the flames of hell. A clergyman who should utter such a sentiment as that would be deprived of the pulpit, or his salary would be cut off at once. All through the country the clergy are losing their prestige and their power. They are either conforming to public sentiment, or else they are leaving the profession, turning insurance agents, and insuring against fire in this world, instead of threatening us with hell-fire in the next. The great mass of the people who are not brought in contact with the clergy hardly understand all their heterodoxy. It is part of my business to have conversations with them, and sometimes discussions, and I know whereof I speak when I say you can hardly ever get a clergyman to affirm a positive dogma. I not long since had a discussion with a gentleman who occupies the position of professor in a theological seminary in Indianapolis, and he took the ground, when the question came up, that a man might believe what part of the Bible he chose to be divine, and what part he chose to be uninspired. He took the ground that the story of the flood, of which the Bible speaks so unqualifiedly, was a little affair, perhaps confined to Asia Minor; and before he got through, he did not know that there was anything sacred except Noah and his family, his pigs and his chickens, thus affording an opportunity for one of the city papers to say of this professor, that he had brought the flood into the limits of a wash-basin, and to ask, "Are you disposed to reject the Bible on such a small amount of water as this?"

Some of you have read in Scribner's—rather an Orthodox journal—the articles written by Dr. Blauvelt, an Orthodox man, in which he admits that the advances in free-thought are so rapid, that unless something is done in the next decade, unless lawyers, merchants, and unprofessional men come to the assistance of the clergy, we shall be doing precisely what they are doing in Europe to-day: that men will go up and down the land, lifting their hands in despair, and exclaiming, "Our faith is gone!" Dr. Blauvelt himself has given offence to the Christian world because he has stated the truth so plainly and frankly. He tells Christians that they have no men who can meet the champions of free-thought; that such men as Strauss, Renan, Darwin, and Spencer are too strong; that their investigation has been too thorough by far to enable the Christian clergymen to meet them with success; and calls upon them to obtain a higher culture, and a more thorough acquaintance with the subject, before they attempt to compete with those men.

Let me say, in conclusion, that the advance which this hall significantly marks has been made in every department. In geology, destroying the old cosmogony of the Hebrews; in archaeology, destroying the old notions of the primitive perfection of mankind; in Egyptology, showing that mankind were in a high state of civilization at the very time the flood is said to have occurred; in philology, showing us that the languages are in utter opposition with the notions that God composed them, and that the old Hebrew language was probably the primitive one; in natural history, and in every department in which Science has extended her researches, she has gone so far as to destroy the authority of the Bible in its historical and scientific teachings, and also to advance and strengthen the principles of free-thought.

I say, then, in conclusion, my friends, that we have every reason to feel grateful, and to feel especially joyful, on this occasion, since the erection of this hall is actually an indication of the advancement of free-thought; and when we consider what kind of halls were spoken in by free-thinkers in the days of Thomas Paine, and look at this building, we must feel something of pleasure in the progress that has been made.—Boston Investigator, Feb. 17.

REMARKS OF F. E. ABBOT

AT THE DEDICATION OF PAINE MEMORIAL BUILDING, JAN. 20, 1875.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—Perhaps I ought to apologize to you for consenting to say even a few words with the severe cold I labor under; but when we consider what the work in hand is to-day—to speak a word of grateful appreciation of Thomas Paine, to express our interest in the cause of free-thought, and to bring our congratulations to these old veterans in the cause, that they have reared an excellent and useful "Home"—perhaps even a husky voice will need no apology.

We have listened this evening to a most eloquent address, setting forth in detail the great merits of Thomas Paine, his services to the country, and our obligations to him. I was especially interested in listening to the analysis of Thomas Paine's services to free-thought. I think Mr. Underwood expressed a thought that is very important and very true; namely, that Thomas Paine was a great popularizer of free-thought, and did more, perhaps, than any other one man of his age to spread our common principle, the love of freedom, broadcast among the people. For those services I think he is worthy of a recognition which has been withheld.

We have been accustomed for a great many years to hear the clergy indulge in the most (I must say) insincere, certainly the most offensive, maledictions against the name and fame of Thomas Paine. We have heard slanders repeated which every well-informed person knows to be slanders. We have heard them taken up and passed from mouth to mouth, without the least indication of a desire to find out whether they were true or not. What reply has been made to those slanders against the name of Thomas Paine? There are replies in books. These stories have been met; these slanders have been refuted. Any one who wishes to know the truth about the matter can easily learn that those stories are libels, and utterly misrepresent one of the best men whom this country ever harbored.

But that reply is not enough. Have we no other reply to make to these long-continued and malevolent slanders? Friends, I think that this stately hall is to be our reply. This building shows not only that the men who believe in free-thought disbelieve those stories, but it also shows that they have sufficient reverence for Thomas Paine to put their hands deep into their pockets, and contribute the funds necessary to rear this noble monument to his memory. That is an argument to which the common mind readily responds; and, although I am sorry for it, I think this argument will be more respectfully listened to than any argument that has ever yet been offered in this country. At least, it is a testimony to the respect and reverence we feel for an earnest champion of free-thought, for a great and noble defender of American principles; and this testimony can no longer be overlooked, ignored, or despised.

The cause of free-thought to which Thomas Paine dedicated a large part of his life, and to which he rendered such inestimable services, is still our cause to-day. With his usual discrimination, Mr. Underwood has shown you the advances that have been made in this country, and it is a true picture. Nevertheless, there is another side. Bigotry and intolerance are not all dead yet. They are somewhat intimidated (that is a fashionable word now-a-days); they are not so blatant or so urgent as once, but they still survive, and events can easily be conceived which might fan these smouldering embers into a great and disastrous conflagration. The work we have to do is to strengthen and deepen and build up more stoutly than ever the fortifications of this liberty, and there is still need for the public word, uttered on the platform and in the paper. There is still need for men to give their time, their hearts, their souls, and their minds to the propagation of free opinions. In this connection, we all certainly take great satisfaction in seeing that our friends, Horace Seaver and Josiah P. Mendum, who have lived for forty years well known in our midst, and have to-day the respect of the whole community, are now to enter apparently upon a little easier period in their long warfare; that they can look with pride upon this noble building, and feel that it is partly a recognition of their own work and service. I came here to-night more for this purpose than any other—to tell them how glad I am that they have been at work, and how faithfully I think they have done their work, and to express my hearty respect and appreciation for the nobleness of their service; and with these few words I make room for other and better speakers.—Boston Investigator, Feb. 17.

PRISON REFORM.

Our readers will already have noted that Congress has passed a joint resolution, authorizing the President to appoint a commission to a World's Prison Congress to be held at Rome next year. This movement of authoritative interest in the subject is doubtless due to the fact that, although the idea of international consultation with regard to prison reform originated in the United States, less sympathy with the reform has as yet been shown by our own government than by any other. We are told in the report of the Association, that the penal codes of Russia, Holland, Italy, several Swiss cantons, and Japan have been changed, or are in process of change, in accordance with the more enlightened and Christian ideas promulgated by the last International Congress. It should be borne in mind, however, that, while the idea of joint labor and sympathy between the nations in the matter of prison reform originated here, the idea of prison reform itself originated elsewhere, and that we are indebted to other nations for the humane and improved systems which are slowly supplanting those so long in use. It matters little, however, from whom the help to humanity comes, provided we avail ourselves of it. Nor will our participation in a world's congress of reformers be of essential importance unless we profit by the deliberations therein. The previous International Congress held at London in 1872 has, it is true, aroused the attention of most thinking men in this country to the condition of our criminal classes, and in a very noticeable degree altered and humanized our mode of dealing with them. But the progress toward improvement has not been so marked as in other countries which we accustom ourselves to look upon as our inferiors in civilization. The plan proposed by the Association, of a National prison, where the convicts of the United States could be placed, and which should be built and managed upon the most advanced known system of treatment, thus serving as a model for all other jails and penitentiaries, has an apparent and weighty practical value.

The United States prisoners are now boarded in different State prisons, a practice both impolitic and costly. Such a National model would at once make real matter of the humanitarian schemes which are to the majority of our citizens the vaguest theories, and it should be urged to successful completion before the Association concern themselves with less important improvements. The French people, however indifferent they may be to the subject, are necessarily made familiar with the best modes of conducting reformatory schools through the colony at Mettray. The criminal child of the poor man is sent there with an almost absolute certainty of his reform; the idle, refractory son of the rich man goes into the Maison paternelle, and comes home thankful for ordinary college work and discipline. In the same manner the Englishman is familiarized with the idea that the punishment of the convict should be reformatory as well as punitive through the workings of the Crofton system. It is not through International Congresses or bulky reports that the real reform is to be accomplished in this country, but by some actual work done, to whose success one can point with assurance of approval. The National prison would offer arguments in brick and mortar, and we hope in criminals regenerated into honest citizens.

The work of the Association, too, could be rendered more effective in this country if it were made known through a cheaper and more widely diffused mode of publication. The reports of International and National Congresses are volumes of carefully digested information essential to every library, but certainly too costly to reach State legislators, or jail and prison wardens. How many of either class could give an intelligent account of the system of M. Demetz for the redemption of criminal children, or of Maconochie for that of adult convicts? Yet, after all, it is the State legislator who must inaugurate these reforms in this country, and the warden and jailer who must carry them into effect.

The appointment of the commission is a step in a right direction; but we should be glad if the commission could carry with them a better report of tangible good accomplished than they are now able to present.—New York Tribune, Feb. 22.

PROSPER MERIMEE'S Letters to an Inconnue, show the French Emperor and Empress in a very pleasant light. Merimee seems to have had for both as genuine and warm an esteem as it was in his nature to have for anybody. The wonderful grace and delicacy of the letters seem to cover the emptiness of a sceptical and exceedingly sad life. A man of rare cultivation and refinement, Merimee seems to have viewed religion as a curious relic of barbarism, sexual virtue as a conventional fiction, and love as the highest form of amusement. The bitter sense of emptiness in life which now and then plainly expresses itself is as suggestive as it is mournful. It is common to speak of the hardness and barrenness which his want of spiritual faith gave to John Stuart Mill's life, and we think there is truth in the remark. But there was in Mill an earnestness and loftiness of purpose which uplifted him. The austere soberness of his life was totally different from the empty wretchedness that underlies Merimee's graceful trifling. We note the contrast, as marking the difference between the man who, losing faith, still holds firm to conscience and duty, and the one who has no higher conviction or principle than that "sugar is sweet."—Christian Union.

THE TALLAHASSEE Sentinel tells the story of two colored men, named Handy Griffin and Ed Harris, who are employed on the Stafford place, in Gadsden County, Florida, about twelve miles from Tallahassee, on the other side of the Ocklockonee. They had a patch given them of nine acres, and this they cultivated without the aid of horse or mule, and after the regular hour for work on the plantation. One pulled the plough while the other held, and where the ground was too stubborn for one to drag the plough through their wives assisted them. Five acres are in corn and four in cotton, and both crops are as fine as any to be seen within the limits of the county.

SPRING.

I'm sighing now for Spring-time,
For flowers sweet and fair,
For my fragrant, wild-wood temple,
And the friend that meets me there;
I'm sighing for the converse
I hold with Nature sweet;
Peace then pervades my being,
And happiness complete.

I'm sighing for the quiet
Of that little linden grove,
Where tall pines, sighing round me,
Whisper sweet words of love;
I'm sighing for the lessons
That nowhere I may learn,
Save resting on my mossy seat
Beside the waving fern.

I'm sighing for the music
From the sweet, feathered choir,
That lifts my soul above the clay,
And satisfies desire;
Whose warblings thrill like magic,
And quell the lofty mind,
And give the heart rich pleasures
That leave no gloom behind.

O, Wisdom, Love, and Goodness!
I meet you in the glen,
While superstitious Folly
Lurks in the haunts of men.
Come, blooming wild-wood flowers,
My temple to surround,
And breathe of sinless pleasure
That in its courts are found!

THE CHURCH.

Religion in conflict with Science?
Religion and Science are friends!
'Tis the Church that sets at defiance
Law and reason, to answer its ends:

The Church is the foe of progress,
As her crimson records show;
She raises the cry of "Godless!"
When Science the truth would know.

With power supreme, for ages,
Her reckless crimes behold,
And read on her blood-stained pages
Who were her martyrs of old.

Our teachers, our healers,—we claim them
The world's benefactors to-day:
With reverent lips we name them,—
They worked, leaving churchmen to pray.

Though her fires no more are kindled,
Or heretics put to the sword,
Her bitterness never has dwindled;
"Anathema" still is her word.

And Protestant churches follow
Her spirit, as far as they can,—
Her old maledictions borrow,
To keep Truth under the ban.

THE GREAT ISSUE.

The article of Rev. Mr. Savage on another page, replying to a recent article of our own, will doubtless command the attention it deserves from the readers of THE INDEX. Whoever may shuffle or evade, shuffling or evasion is no part of his purpose; that is clear. And we rejoice that there is a growing disposition to meet the grave issues which it is the special work of THE INDEX to press, in a spirit befitting their gravity and importance. "The whole question involved in this discussion," says Mr. Savage, "I take to be this: are freedom and Christianity consistent?" True. It is time that the Christians of Christianity should address themselves to the discussion of this question with all the ability, force, and courage at their command. It is no logomachy, we assure them—no war of words, no splitting of hairs, no vexing of the air with aimless blows. No! It is the great debate on which the whole civilized world is just beginning to enter, here with shivering dread, there with glowing hope and indomitable resolve. It is that which underlies all the other prominent issues in the realms of thought and of action; and none of these lighter issues can be permanently solved so long as this profounder controversy remains unsettled. Perhaps it is the vast and overshadowing importance of this question of questions, involving as it does such transcendent interests, that has made men afraid to meet it face to face; but the time has come for all undaunted thinkers to shake off this reluctance, and throw themselves with all their energies into the now inevitable discussion. Welcome, therefore, to every earnest word!

Although Mr. Savage pleads for Christianity, he also pleads for freedom; and he therefore denies, as do all Neo-Christians, that there is any inconsistency or real conflict between the two. Stating the question afresh, he asks: "Can a man be free, and at the same time wear the name of Christian and in any real sense acknowledge the authority of Jesus? My answer is an emphatic yes." He then asks, first what freedom is, and afterwards what the authority of Jesus is; and his answers are such that he thinks he disproves the reality of any supposed conflict between the two. Let us see how this is.

We do not see that there is any essential difference between Mr. Savage's views and our own views as to what freedom really is. He holds that it does not imply the power of escaping from the control of the laws of Nature; neither do we. Not a word, so far as we can remember, has ever dropped from our pen in favor of any notion so absurd. Of course, every man is bound by the laws of his own organization; nobody disputes that. Neither shall we here raise the question of "free-will"; though we do say in passing that, if a man is "not free to do a mean or dishonest act," he is not free to do a noble or upright one, since the power to do the one implies the power to do the other. This is as true of God as of man, if God possesses the attributes of all moral being. All this part of Mr. Savage's article is irrelevant. By "absolute freedom" we have always meant substantially what he means by "perfect freedom"; namely, freedom to obey the laws of Nature and Reason "without external compulsion or restraint." It is the total absence of all such compulsion or restraint by human authority that we always refer to in the phrase "absolute freedom"; and Mr. Savage's word "perfect," it seems, means the same thing. On the abstract question of the nature of freedom there is scarcely any difference between us.

But when the Free Religious Association is dwarfed into a mere "World's Congress of Religions," we begin to part company with Mr. Savage. This Association affirms "absolute liberty of thought and expression." When has any one of these historical religions ever affirmed or practised that? Has Christianity ever done it? Let its history reply. The simple fact is that, by affirming this principle of "absolute liberty of thought and expression," the Free Religious Association has taken ground which can be consistently taken by no one of all these religions. It takes ground that is the point-blank denial of the special authority which they all claim; and, whether the individual members admit the fact or not, they have collectively laid down the premises whose only logical conclusion is the anti-Christianity and scientific Free Religion of THE INDEX. Its platform is certainly free to every believer in a special religion who thinks he can reconcile his religion with freedom; nevertheless it is our private opinion (shared by very few, if any, of our fellow-members) that he cannot come upon that platform without surrendering totally the special claim of authority which is his religion's fundamental principle. In other words, we consider him logically inconsistent and mistaken; and that is the real reason why all Orthodox persons are proof against the sincere invitations, so often extended to them, to speak on that platform. Only the heterodox are attracted to it; and, since the first year or two, only the heterodox have come to it. Consequently, when Mr. Savage claims to exercise perfect liberty of thought and expression "as a Unitarian," we consider him as laboring under a delusion. He happens not to have desired yet to transgress the invisible yet real boundary of Unitarian liberty; but it is there, and he will find it there, if he ever changes his views as some have already done. We can safely leave him to find it out for himself.

But he takes in his present article a position he cannot successfully defend. We had asked: "When has any such freedom [as that of the Free Religious Association] even been verbally affirmed by any Unitarian body?" To this he replies: "I answer only for myself; but I say, I recognize no Unitarian body that has any right or business to assume the superfluous prerogative of telling me I am free. I am, and intend to be. To say 'you may' implies the right to say 'you may not.' At least, Unitarians recognize no form of words that deny freedom."

Now to this reply there is a rejoinder which we should like to have candidly met; and because Mr. Savage is very candid and fearless, we ask him to meet it.

What was the position he originally took? Substantially this—that "Unitarianism" should not "allow Free Religion to take from her the glorious prestige of utter freedom." This, then, is the position which, when challenged as we challenged it, he is bound to defend; unless (what we utterly disbelieve) he means adroitly to shift the issue and dodge the point. It is Unitarianism he has undertaken to champion and protect from the sharp thrusts of criticism; it is the ism itself, not his own private opinions merely, that he has proposed to prove consistent with perfect freedom. This he certainly will not deny.

When, therefore, we point out that the principle of perfect freedom has not even been verbally affirmed by any Unitarian body, he has no right to say that he "answers only for himself." He is bound to answer for Unitarianism, and not for himself. He is bound to do what we always scrupulously do with regard to the Free Religious Association. As we discriminate with conscientious care between what it says and what we say, so he is bound to discriminate between what the Unitarian denomination says and what he himself says. If he refuses thus to discriminate, and insists that he has a right to make Unitarianism utter whatever words and proclaim whatever principles he chooses to put into its mouth, then he claims what his fellow-ministers will certainly never concede to him. They will claim just as good a right as his to put forward their private opinions as the only authorized exposition of Unitarianism. Does not Mr. Savage perceive the enormous presumption he has inadvertently fallen into, in thus electing himself to the office of authoritative spokesman for his denomination? As our readers know, a good friend of ours has recently charged us in these columns with assuming a certain infallibility. Well—if we had ever done what Mr. Savage does now, and had ever supposed ourselves qualified to define the principles of the Free Religious Association regardless of its collective utterances, we should admit that our friend had abundantly proved his charge to be true. No—we cannot accept Mr. Savage's reply, when he "answers only for himself." We did not ask him to answer for himself; we asked him to answer for Unitarianism; and we deny that he can do that without going to the collective utterances and acts of the Unitarian denomination. By these utterances and acts alone must Unitarianism be judged, just as the Republican party must be judged by its collective words and deeds, and not by the irresponsible speeches of any individual who may assume to speak in its name. Surely this point is too crystal-clear to need further enforcement or illustration. Whoever joins a party, wears its name, and accepts its offices, is bound in honor not to repudiate the obligation he has thereby acknowledged to abide by its collective action and utterance. If this is more than he can do, there is only one honorable course: namely, to sever his connection publicly and completely with the party itself.

Knowing Mr. Savage, therefore, to be a man of unblemished honor, we consider his reply above quoted to be a very hasty and inconsiderate one, which he will be sure to change on further reflection. He is bound by the action and platform of his new party; he has no right to disregard the voice of the Unitarian denomination as a whole, or to "answer only for himself." If he cannot show that the denomination acts and speaks for freedom, in the full sense of the word which he attributes to it, he has no right to say that Unitarianism is perfectly free. What, then, is the fact?

"At least," says Mr. Savage, "Unitarians recognize no form of words that deny freedom." In saying this, he shows that he is not well-informed as to the facts. We point him at once to the famous preamble of the "National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches"—the great representative body of the Unitarian sect whose action and platform bind all the churches that send delegates to it, as Mr. Savage's does. This preamble avows "our sense of the obligation of all disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ to prove their faith by self-denial, and by the devotion of their lives and possessions to the service of God and the building-up of the kingdom of his Son." Here it appears that the Unitarians are collectively pledged to believe in and serve Jesus Christ as "Lord and King." Is not that a "form of words that denies freedom"? Most certainly, unless they choose to confess that they palter with words in a double sense. It is vain for Mr. Savage to disavow this preamble, as if it did not concern or bind him. It does concern and bind every Unitarian minister; for it publicly and authoritatively, by collective utterance, defines the ism that he publicly professes to the world. Probably, judging by his present article, Mr. Savage can consistently accept this preamble as the honest expression of his own individual faith. He is not, therefore, personally aggrieved by it at all; but he ought to recognize its binding force as the only authorized definition of Unitarianism before the world, and, instead of "answering only for himself," admit that the National Conference has answered for him in advance.

But Mr. Savage refers to his own church as a "Unitarian organization" that practically illustrates a fellowship totally unrestricted by any creed. We know nothing about his church in this respect; but we do know that, if it sends delegates to the National Conference, thereby publicly professes to acknowledge the binding force of the Conference's preamble, and yet secretly repudiates it at home, there is nothing in such a state of things to satisfy any one who loves consistency with high principle. The same is true of any private agreement between a minister and a society that shall emancipate the former from the denominational preamble-creed, while yet this creed is sanctioned by both through membership in the National Conference. There are a great many tortuous things said and done, we dare say without consciousness of their real meaning, in consequence of the looseness and slipshod character of Neo-Christians; but the general haze that conceals tortuousness does not straighten it. The only course that can be commended, in a society that confesses the creed of the Conference by retaining membership in that body, is to obey that creed honestly in its practice: to require all its own members to believe in that creed individually, and to employ no minister who will not be bound by it.

Mr. Savage goes into various refinements as to the meaning of the word "Christ" which it is unnecessary to consider; for he admits that "all Unitarians hold that Jesus was 'Christ' in some sense. Very well; that settles the point we raised. No minister who should make it a prominent part of his preaching that Jesus was not the Christ, in any sense that he himself regarded as proper, would be allowed long to remain in his pulpit; and that is where the necessity of keeping silence on this point "touches the matter of one's religious freedom." But we instanced three doctrines, not one only, which no Unitarian minister can question without being speedily cashiered: the Christship of Jesus, the personality of God, the immortality of the soul. Mr. Savage has nothing to say respecting the latter two. He knows as well as we do that belief of these three doctrines is expected of every Unitarian minister, and that openly professed doubt or disbelief of them will cost him his position. Now can entire liberty of thought and speech (call it "absolute" or "perfect" as you prefer) be preserved or respected, if all utterance on these great doctrines must be pledged beforehand to the affirmative side? Why not face the fact at once, that Unitarianism does not permit "perfect" liberty of thought and expression? Why do not Unitarians all frankly admit that fact, saying (if they please) that they are all contented with a degree of liberty less than "perfect"? Why keep up this false pretence of "perfect" liberty, when every close observer knows that their liberty is not "perfect"? It may be a fair subject of debate whether "perfect" liberty is desirable or not; but it certainly must include the right to deny as well as to affirm, and to do either without incurring any penalty, direct or indirect, from man. Shall the world never get rid of this mountainous load of repression, which so perverts the intelligence in the search for truth by attacking the thinker from behind, and stabbing him with threatened punishment if he fails to come out at the orthodox end of the road? Let the mask be dropped which now deceives so many excellent minds, fancying they follow freedom when they are led along by silken chains.

No space remains to consider Mr. Savage's second point concerning the "authority of Jesus." This he rationalizes into the "authority of truth"; and when this is done completely, Jesus sinks out of sight as "authority" in any special sense. When one comes to count up "authorities" in the sense of persons who have told new truths to the world, or told old truths in a new and efficient way, their name is legion; and the alleged great superiority of any one of them vanishes under analysis. The "authority of truth" is one thing—that we "bow to" with unutterable reverence; but the "authority of Jesus" is another thing—and we have long since forgotten to remember it, when truth is spoken of. Persons vanish when ideas appear; and he who has once caught a glimpse of the glory of the Universal "leaves all and follows" it.

To conclude: Mr. Savage has met our appeal to facts with general considerations mainly. We pointed out that, while the Free Religious Association affirms "absolute liberty of thought and expression," and has been strictly faithful to it in its practice, Christianity, even in its Unitarian form, neither affirms nor practises it; and the force of the facts we adduced remains wholly unbroken. Can he break it? We believe not; but, if he can, our columns are open for the demonstration of our own mistake. Meanwhile we maintain still that Freedom and Christianity are not "consistent," but that every man must choose between them.

PRAYER AGAIN.

The kindly criticism of Dr. Clarke on my little article about prayer, printed in a recent number of THE INDEX, shows that I touched a nerve, and justifies another word in regard to the subject. The scrap that came from my pen, though fragmentary and abrupt, was carefully considered and compacted; not a thought was heedlessly fashioned; not a word was hastily selected. The substance it contained might have been spread out to cover a broad space, and, if it had been, would probably have been more intelligible than it was. Still, I cannot conceal my surprise that any intelligent reader of it should have missed its point. In that article, as in all I ever wrote on the subject, the word prayer was used in the accepted sense as describing petition addressed to an invisible, extramundane being—either personal deity, angel, or departed spirit,—who, out of resources otherwise inaccessible to the suppliant, is supposed to be able to bestow temporal or spiritual gifts. By religious people and in religious usage prayer means this,—nothing less and nothing else. To the petitions that men address one to another,—the poor to the rich, the weak to the strong, the simple to the wise, the infirm of purpose to the good,—the word prayer, in its religious sense, is never applied. That human beings should ask and receive aid of all kinds from one another is perfectly natural and simple. They are bound up in the same bundle of life; they exist under the same laws and within the same conditions; they are mutually sympathetic and dependent; they touch at many points; they have common needs; they draw from common sources; in a word, they are human beings, and make requests on one another by the impulse of their common humanity. Surely, the distinction between the fellow-creatures that surround us, and spirits good or bad, angels, demons, deities, which are, say what we will, creatures of our imagination, at all events beings of different spheres and relations, is too clear to be insisted on.

Equally plain must it be that the gifts which human beings bestow on one another in response to requests are altogether different in kind, in method, and in condition of bestowal, from the gifts which extramundane, supernatural beings dispense to their petitioners. Between the benefactions of human fellows, living, working, and suffering together, and the benefactions of another order of persons in remote and ideal worlds, there is no analogy. Because I help my brother man, it does not follow that God will help him. If God does or will, why should I? It is because I am persuaded that God does not, and will not, for any supplication, that I do; and therefore, among other reasons, I contend that prayer to God for benefits that we can earn for ourselves, or obtain from our fellows on well understood terms, is practically demoralizing. It is conceded now by philanthropists that earning is better for all concerned than begging, even from men. How much better it must be than begging from imaginary beings!

One word more on another part of the subject. Dr. Clarke seems to fall into the common error of confounding prayer with aspiration,—a confusion that is fatal to all intelligent discourse about the matter. In aspiration the disbelievers in prayer cordially believe, and warmly express their belief. It is their noble substitute for prayer. Aspiration after beauty, truth, goodness, serenity, peace, is a distinguishing quality of the rational being, natural as the plant's longing for the sun. Aspiration differs from prayer in several important respects, and in each of these respects it has the advantage in point of spiritual dignity. Prayer is mechanical; aspiration is vital. Prayer encourages the feeling of dependence on foreign and unseen powers; aspiration encourages the growth and expansion of the longing soul. Prayer makes one a pool; aspiration makes one a fountain. Prayer is never sure of answer, is a dom supposed to be answered directly, is hampered with so many conditions that answer to it is practically impossible, is made the subject of endless casuistry to justify the withholding of answer (nearly all the treatises on prayer being explanations and apologies for the dead silence with which it is received); while aspiration is always responded to, is satisfied by the law of supply and demand, as inevitably as color and fragrance come to the healthy plant that has found the sunbeam.

That ordinary, undiscerning, unreflecting minds should confound two processes so essentially unlike is not surprising. I certainly should not accuse Dr. Clarke of such heedlessness on the strength of any private inference of my own. But he confesses the fault himself in a single sentence, if he is correctly reported in the Christian Register of February 20th: "What is prayer," he asks, "but the longing of the soul toward the highest, the communion of the soul with infinite truth and infinite beauty, the opening of the heart to receive the divinest influences?" To which I for one respond heartily, amen. If that is what the good man means by prayer, the controversy between us is one of words. O. B. F.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I hold views on the subject of "Church and State" which you would doubtless call very heretical in a Liberal like me. I have seen so much of the benefits of an Established Church, and so much also of the evils of voluntarism, that I unhesitatingly say there is more real liberty under the former than under the latter; more protection for individual opinions, and greater opportunities for their expression. And if I can say this, who have myself undergone prosecution and deprivation for my opinions, and might be expected to rail at the Established Church system on account of my own grievances, I think some weight may attach to my preference for that system over an independent sectarianism. But I must confess that if anything would drive me from my present convictions, and make me a red-hot Non-conformist and supporter of Radical anti-State churchmen, it would be the action taken by the office of the Lord Chamberlain, in reference to the Sunday League, and to the closing of the theatres on Ash Wednesday.

No true friend of the people desires to relax for one instant the present restrictions on Sunday labor, seeing that their needs are all the other way, and that more and not less rest and recreation are wanted in this high-pressure age. But the Sunday League are conspicuously on this side of the question, and desire not to extend Sunday labor, but to extend Sunday recreation, and to add to the wholesome and instructive amusements of the people for whom so little in this direction has been provided.

The "Sunday Evenings for the People," on which you recently commented, are preëminently designed to afford wholesome recreation through one source of pleasure; namely, music; and this is combined with a lecture on some historical, literary, or scientific subject, which cannot fail to instruct the audience, or to set them thinking and reading for themselves.

These entertainments have already been made the subject of dispute at law; and the decision arrived at by our judges was that they were perfectly legal. One would suppose that such a decision, though it might not at all satisfy a Puritan minister, would be quite sufficient to guide the conduct of a Secretary of State. But it has done no such thing. The "Sunday Evenings for the People" have been literally stabbed from behind. They have been virtually prohibited from being held in those public halls where their success was a certainty, and now they have taken refuge in a chapel—South Place Chapel—in the "city," of all places the most unsuitable to attract people on Sunday nights.

But how have they been driven out from St. George's Hall, and other well-known places of resort? By the arbitrary interference of the Lord Chamberlain, who has privately intimated to the lessees of the various places that their licenses will be withdrawn, if they let the buildings to the Sunday League! Now this is "Church and State" in one of its vilest and most insulting combinations. It is the power of exercising religious bigotry and persecution through the agency of one of our civil offices.

Who would not rather see the State entirely secularized than be made the tool of fanaticism? If the functions of the Lord Chamberlain cannot be detached from the bias of personal prejudice, the sooner they are abolished or reconstructed the better.

I must tell you that I do not know personally any one concerned in this petty tyranny. For aught I know, the present Lord Chamberlain, who is nominally responsible for the mandates issued from his office, is as innocent of the mischief as I am; but somebody pulls the wires, at all events, and that somebody is doing his best to undermine the relations between Church and State, and to bring the former into very ill odor.

For, notice another shameless interference with public rights and pleasures, even worse in its encroachment on liberty than the opposition illegally offered to the Sunday League.

Last Ash Wednesday, the 10th instant, all the theatres were closed (for theatrical entertainments) by order of the Lord Chamberlain!

I suppose you poor benighted Americans do not know what Ash Wednesday is, and in your profound scorn of antiquity have never bowed down your heads as a bulrush, or sat in dust and ashes on this most sacred and solemn day. In some English homes it is a day of fasting and humiliation to little boys and girls who have eaten too many pancakes on Shrove Tuesday; but, beyond that mortification of the flesh, Ash Wednesday is but little noticed or respected, even amongst church people.

The House of Commons generally sits later than usual on that day to allow of severe members going to church to hear the "Commination Service," with its pretty litany of curses. Beyond this, it has not been usual to make any public recognition of the day as a solemn one; and unless it were made a general holiday, like Good Friday, one cannot regret it.

Now to issue State orders to close the theatres on the evening of that day is, in my eyes, an act of consummate impudence—a very dangerous tampering with the rights of the people,—a barefaced interference with wonted liberties, and all on the shallowest and weakest of pretences, that the Church has ordered people to fast on Ash Wednesday!

It is some small-headed and effeminate ritualist that is at the bottom of the untimely measure.

If the Lord Chamberlain is in any way pressed to comply with such requirements, the sooner his office is released from such a contemptible misuse of authority, the better. We can all understand the Lord Chamberlain insisting that if A, B, or C likes to fast and to go to church instead of to the theatre, he shall be at liberty to do so without let or hindrance; but it is as comical as it is outrageous, at this time of day, to tell many thousands of our fellow-subjects that, because A, B, or C makes a fool of himself, they must all appear to do so too, and wipe their eyes with the corner of their aprons because he has taken to whimpering and whining!

If you are in danger, over there, from a similar impertinence, I do not wonder at your resisting so fiercely every attempt to blend Church and State, and to keep most watchful guard against the insinuation of so-called "religious" principles into the Constitution.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, London, S. E.,
Feb. 13, 1875.

MY DEAR ABBOT:—

I hope this is not too late for insertion immediately under my last letter to you, dated February 13th.

I find that my ignorance of the ways of this gay and wicked city has led me into an error, for which I hasten to make a most ample apology to the Lord Chamberlain's office. It appears that it is an old custom, and not a new one, to forbid theatrical performances on Ash Wednesday; and therefore it is unreasonable to denounce the act of the Lord Chamberlain as if it were an encroachment on previously existing liberties. I was led into the mistake by seeing a protest against it in the Times, signed by all the leading actors and actresses. My letter, fierce as it was and uncalled for, will do no harm, if this apology be inserted with it; for the principle which it attacks is a thoroughly bad one, and I have little doubt that the Marquis of Hartford, the present Lord Chamberlain, would be among the first to desire that this odious regulation should be detached from his otherwise important and valuable functions.

I am very sincerely yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

OBJECTIONS TO THE "DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM."

PROVIDENCE, R. I., March 1, 1875.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

If I mistake not, you are one of those—shall I say few?—men who believe in friendly criticism; and I have often had it in mind to criticise your position as indicated by the "Demands of Liberalism." With some of those demands I am not disposed to find fault (if, indeed, honest criticism may be called fault-finding); but there are others that, it seems to me, hardly do justice to the platform, if I may so term it, of a majority of the so-called Liberals.

1. Let us consider first the Bible question. Though I think there are serious objections to its use in the public schools "as a book of religious worship," I can see no good reasons for prohibiting its use as a text-book. If, as you argued on the marriage question, "the abolition of marriage would be an interference with the liberty of those who prefer to marry," I cannot see why the same argument does not apply with equal force to the Bible question. Would not the prohibition of its use as a text-book be a "direct interference with the liberty of those who prefer" to use it as such? I thought you did not approve of prohibitory laws.

2. Again, as to the use of Sunday: would not the entire repeal of all Sunday laws be, in effect, an interference with the personal liberty of such as wish to use it as a day of worship? Suppose, for instance, that a building is in the process of erection in close proximity to a church. There being no laws to protect this body of worshippers, the carpenters and masons would be allowed to disturb the meetings, and of very little use would it be for them to attempt to put a stop to such disturbances. A modification of the Sunday laws would no doubt be advantageous; but an entire repeal would, in effect, be delivering up the day and its government into the hands of a care-for-nobody class, which, like one of the young men described by Mr. Emerson in his account of the Brook Farm experiment, would probably insist on working Sundays, though the whole town might not be able to make them work any other day.

3. Again: I can see no objections to the appointment of "religious festivals," by the President, or by the State Governors, provided there be no attempt to compel the observance of the same. Indeed, I think there have been such days appointed (as, for instance, during the administration of Abraham Lincoln), which were far from being hurtful to the nation, or to any of its individual representatives.

4. Again: To "demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of 'Christian' morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality," seems to be a demand that the American people shall forthwith be converted to our peculiar notions, accept our definitions of "Christian morality," and also believe in the "natural morality" of all mankind; which changes in the public mind no "demands" are likely to bring about.

5. One word farther in regard to the use of the Bible as a text-book. One of our speakers has suggested (and I think without injustice) that such a book as Mr. Conway's Sacred Anthology could not well be used in the schools, if the use of the Bible was prohibited, inasmuch as it contains selections from that book. Of course there would be the same objections to any other book which contained similar quotations.

6. And now, friend Abbot, in conclusion: With all respect for you as a man, and without a shadow of doubt of your entire sincerity in the matter, are not such demands more likely to create a feeling of antagonism than to convince any one of the truth of your position? So it seems to me, at least, and I feel sure that many others share this feeling with me.

Yours for true liberty,

MARCUS T. JANES.

[No one need fear that we shall ever take offence at or misunderstand "friendly criticism." Whatever we say publicly we submit to that "universal reason" which we theoretically accept as our just judge.

1. We have never advocated "prohibiting the use of the Bible as a text-book" in general. What we do advocate is to abolish all religious services "now sustained by the government," and the use of the Bible "in the public schools." This we do simply on the ground that Church and State ought to be separate,—that the State should not maintain public worship or give religious instruction. Marriage is a civil contract, and is therefore a proper subject for legislation; to abolish it would be to withhold protection from all who choose to make this contract. We have never argued against all "prohibition"; we certainly believe in prohibiting theft, murder, arson, and all other crimes, and (among these other crimes) the crime of taxing the whole people to propagate the religion of only a part of the people.

2. We have never advocated the "entire repeal of all Sunday laws." Our critic should read much more carefully what he criticises. We only advocate the repeal of all laws "enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath." If the people vote that Sunday shall be a legal holiday, we have no objection, but are glad of it; and we have said again and again that worshippers should be protected from interruption in their worship. But they have no right to say that non-worshippers shall not be allowed to work or play on Sunday, if they wish to. The State has no right to have a "Sabbath."

3. We do not object to any fasts or festivals observed by common consent. But we protest against the proclamation of either by the State, as an act of recognition of anybody's private religion; for this makes us all take off our hats to his family idols.

4. The State is founded on "natural morality" alone; that is, on the laws of natural justice, personal liberty, equal rights. Let it stick to those laws, which are not by any means our "peculiar notions." If it is founded on the "peculiar notions" of Christianity, it is only the Church in disguise, and may rightly burn Mr. Janes himself for heresy. Instead of "converting" people to strange gods, we only ask the State to let the people's gods alone, and confine itself to its professed function of protecting life, liberty, and property.

5. The Bible is not a "text-book" of anything except religion; and that is why we object to it. The State has no business to teach religion at all; consequently it can use no such text-book without injustice. If Mr. Conway's Anthology were proposed as a text-book of religion, we should oppose it as stoutly, and for the same reason.

6. It is our duty to make sure of the "truth of our position," and to let "feelings" take care of themselves. We put the question directly: is not the principle of the separation of Church and State the great bulwark of all our religious liberty? Very well: we only ask that it be more faithfully obeyed. All the "Demands of Liberalism" aim at this one object. Do not take them piecemeal, but ask yourself if this great principle does not require them all. We have no personal demands whatever. If justice, liberty, and equal rights do not make these "Demands of Liberalism," down comes the flag at the mast-head of THE INDEX; but if they do, then the flag shall not come down till THE INDEX goes to the bottom.—ED.]

THE "DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM" ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

EDITOR INDEX:—

You and your readers will be interested to hear what reception the "Demands of Liberalism" have met with in California. I have taken occasion to present them and urge their claims in San José, Santa Cruz, Stockton, Sacramento, and other places, during the last two years; and everywhere the Liberals heartily approve them. Other lecturers have done the same, and have reported the same result. As in this State we have already secured the first of these "Demands"—the equal taxation of ecclesiastical property,—and it is found to work to general satisfaction, so we are assured it will be with the others; and we mean to obtain them as soon as possible.

The chaplaincy question was pretty thoroughly ventilated at the opening of the last Legislature. Several telling speeches were made by prominent members against the practice of employing chaplains, and at one time it seemed probable that the office would be dispensed with. A resolution was offered to that effect, which was referred to a committee, who reported it back without recommendation. A resolution to proceed to elect a chaplain was lost by a vote of twenty-nine to thirty-five; and a resolution to invite the clergymen of Sacramento to take turns in officiating gratuitously was also voted down. A chaplain was finally chosen, but his pay was cut down to three dollars per day. The discussion set many to thinking on the subject who had not considered it before; and by another year we hope this office in our Legislature will be abolished.

Our thanks are due to the Rev. Alexander Calhoun, of the United Presbyterian Church, San Francisco, for reading the "Demands" in full from his pulpit, and securing their publication in the Occident—which is the organ of Presbyterianism on this coast,—with his comments thereon. Thus thousands have been made acquainted with them who would not have met with them elsewhere; and no doubt some of these will be led to accept them and reject the fallacies of the opposing discourse, which are very apparent.

In one thing the preacher was quite right; namely, his estimate of the importance of the interests involved, and the imperative necessity of meeting the issue promptly. He declared it to be "one of the living issues of the day," and added: "It will not be long until every citizen in our country will be compelled to take a stand upon one side or the other."

The logic of some of Mr. Calhoun's arguments was remarkable. After dwelling at length on the "innumerable blessings" we as a nation are enjoying, the preacher repeated his text, "Happy is that people whose God is the Lord," and laid down these two propositions: "A nation becomes the people of God by acknowledging him and obeying him in her organic capacity"; and "God is propitious toward nations only as they accept the mediatorship and royalty of Christ." He then called attention to what he was pleased to name "the strange and disagreeable fact" that neither God nor Christ were acknowledged in our National Constitution; and, without pausing to offer any explanation of the apparent anomaly, that the nation which had thus ignored God and Christ in its organic law for more than a century had been so signally blessed, proceeded to advocate most earnestly the "Religious Amendment," and attack the "Demands" with as vigorous denunciation as ever his namesake (John C.) used against the postulates of freedom in his day.

Some fifteen years ago, all the Sunday laws of our statute book were declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Certain comparatively mild acts have since been passed; but they involve the same principle, and would not be allowed to remain upon the statute book except as a dead letter. A few feeble attempts were made to enforce them—the last, two years ago,—but utterly failed. The Sunday is devoted to social visiting and cheerful recreation quite as much as to attending church. The public libraries and pleasure gardens are open on Sunday, and many frequent them. Dances on Sunday evening are not infrequent, and picnics are indulged in on that day even by some religious societies.

Our Liberal League in San José circulated and secured a large number of signatures to the petition for the equal taxation of ecclesiastical property in the District of Columbia. More recently it has turned its attention to the matter of Bible-reading and other religious exercises in our public schools. A committee of three, including the Jewish Rabbi, Dr. Levy, and your correspondent, were appointed to interview the teachers and school trustees, and ascertain if the Bible was read, prayers made, or religious hymns sung, in any of the schools; and, if so, whether it was with the approbation of the superintendents and school boards. We found that "the Lord's Prayer" was used in two or three schools only, and in those it had been introduced by the teachers without the knowledge or consent of the authorities, who expressed, in most cases, their decided disapproval of the introduction of any religious exercises, and their intention to make the schools purely secular. The Bible was not read, so far as we could ascertain, in any of the schools; but religious hymns had been sung in several, including the State Normal School in San José, where the singing was followed by an interval for silent prayer. The State and County school superintendents both expressed their conviction that the public schools should be kept entirely free from the introduction of religious doctrines and exercises. The State school law says: "No publication of a sectarian, partisan, or denominational character must be used or distributed in any school, or be made part of any school library; nor must any sectarian or denominational doctrine be taught therein."

The penalty provided, where the officers "knowingly" allow an infringement of this rule, is the forfeiture of the State and County apportionments of school moneys. We hope, by following the thing up, to eliminate the last vestige of this corrupt practice. Of course it is contended by those who wish to retain them that the Bible and "the Lord's Prayer" are not sectarian in the sense intended in the statute.

The San Francisco Board of Education had up that question for discussion last week with respect to "the Lord's Prayer," and decided that it is sectarian. Director Donovan, in order to prevent what he called "pious indiscretions" on the part of some of the teachers, introduced a resolution to discharge any teacher who should "cause or allow to be read, chanted, or sung any religious prayer, anthem, or song." It was referred to the Committee on Rules, who reported that "all the grounds of the resolution were covered by the existing law," and the Board adopted the report.

Rev. Dr. Gibbons, President of the "University of the Pacific," a Methodist institution, in a lecture before a County Teachers' Institute in San José, insisted on the necessity of retaining the Bible in the schools, and called upon all the teachers who used it in their schools to hold up their hand. One hand only went up. The doctor said he hoped there was some mistake, and that his request was not understood. He would ask all who did not use the Bible in their schools to stand up. About seventy teachers responded. The doctor said he was sorry to see that there was no mistake; but he was greatly astonished and aggrieved at the state of things indicated. For one, he would never go into a school where he could not, as a workman, take his "best tool" with him.

At a Teachers' Institute in Los Angeles, recently, the same position was taken by a clerical lecturer, who said, among other things, that the teacher who did not keep his Bible constantly on his school desk, and use it faithfully, was "unfit for his position." "This gave rise," says the Los Angeles Herald, "to an animated discussion as to the introduction of the Bible into the common schools; when it appeared that a majority of the teachers were not in favor of such introduction, or that of the Rig Veda, Alcoran, or Zendavesta."

So you see, Mr. Editor, that the principles of the "Demands of Liberalism" meet with much approval here, and that progress is the watchword with us as well as with you.

J. L. HATCH.

SANTA CLARA, Cal., Feb. 12, 1875.

P.S.—The San Francisco papers, generally, sustain the action of the school boards in ruling "The Lord's Prayer" out of the public schools as "sectarian," and so forbidden by the State law. The Evening Post objects to it; but the Post has a comparatively small circulation, and little influence. The Daily Chronicle, which has a much larger circulation than any other paper this side the Rocky Mountains, says, in an editorial on "The Lord's Prayer," under date of February 8, that it accepts and endorses the decision of the Board, "in recognition of the broad and general doctrine that the public school is not the place to instruct in religious matters. The ordinary schoolmaster and schoolma'am pass an examination for teaching other things, and are not expected to be always entirely Orthodox in their religious beliefs. Besides, it must be confessed that, as our laws recognize no religion, and as our public schools are supported by all—where even the heathen must have their conscientious convictions respected,—the technical argument is against the introduction of any form of prayer into our public schools. While we admit so much, we desire it to be distinctly understood that we see no harm in the Lord's Prayer,—a prayer as old as civilization, which may be doubtless traced to an origin as early as the earliest teachings of philosophy, and every word and sentiment of which is as pure as the purest breath of the moral codes taught by Plato, Aristotle, Mohammed, Confucius, Manes, Solomon, or Christ. . . . Hence we have no prejudice against its use, if it is used reverently and in the right place."

ON SPIRITUALISM.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

In your comments on the article "The Problem of Spiritualism," by J. G. Whyte, you do yourself credit in the way you state your attitude to the subject. I do not think I could possibly be a Spiritualist, if my experience had been the same as yours has been, and I think I understand yours, and I have no doubt you are an honest seeker of not only truth but that truth. I think you are justified in saying that the larger part of the phenomena called "spiritual," exhibited by paid mediums in your presence, has been fraudulent tricks, or more or less so; and those like myself who know there is the real fact also, as well as the fiction in the manifestations, wish very much for some perfect "filterer" that will strain out only the pure article. I had rather at any time have a drop of unmistakable fact than a gallon of an indefinite and uncertain solution. What you say of the phenomena through private and unpaid mediums, and narrated by uninterested parties, where you have nothing but guesses to account for them, where you have no positive opinion, but think greater psychological knowledge will explain them, there you are fair and reasonable, and I have no doubt mainly correct. In your fourth paragraph you say multum in parvo. You "hope a great deal" of the claim of continued consciousness; you think that science is a "mere baby," and that "what it will teach in its maturity is for no man to pronounce"; that you would treat the hope of life's continuance after death tenderly, and that you consider this hope neither "irrational nor superstitious"; but you believe in the life to-day, and the qualifying of ourselves for the "untried existence," if there be one. I have rarely seen so fair a statement from a sceptic. So hospitable a reception to "probable fiction" from your stand-point should give you introduction to a truth unawares.

It is one of the strange things in this connection that the manifestations, mental or physical, under apparently the same conditions, will not influence one accidental circle of people as they will another. The sceptic says it is the credulity of the circle. Whatever else it may be, I know it is not that.

The article that called out your comments to which I have referred I do not propose to criticise or reply to; only refer to for the sake of making myself clear. It begins by admitting a profound truth thus: "If the alleged facts of Spiritualism are facts, there is no subject in the whole range of human affairs of such transcendent importance; for they will be positive proofs that the thinking principle in man is capable of surviving the destruction of the body."

That is the light in which the thoughtful Spiritualist looks at the subject; for so great and transcendent a boon, some are willing to "entertain" possible errors in the hope, or possibility, of entertaining truth unawares. Strange and impossible as it may seem, fully aware of all of Mr. Whyte's materialistic difficulties, some have entertained it in this direction; that is, his "alleged facts," or enough of them for the purpose, are facts. There would seem to be a truth, if not a consolation, in this connection in the words: "He has hidden this knowledge from the wise and prudent and revealed it unto babes." I suppose it should read, to be common-sense, "those who think themselves wise and prudent"; but I am not writing a sermon.

Mr. Whyte, after beginning with the profound truth quoted, considers the "alleged facts" no facts, shuts the door in the face of that transcendently important subject, "because such conscientious observers as Tyndall, Faraday, and Carpenter have pronounced them impostures." He forgets two things: first, the one you stated, "that science to-day is but a baby"; and, secondly, that Wallace, Hare, Varley, Crookes, and other observers equally conscientious, and equally eminent as scholars and scientists, have pronounced them facts. The former have given the subject no attention, one look being enough; the latter have investigated it, at great length of time and under test conditions. Any man who opens with the statement quoted, and then pronounces the facts no facts on his own inexperience, or on the flimsy testimony that he quotes, does not believe in the "transcendent importance of the subject," but uses it as only a figure of speech, a glittering generality, or a platitude. I do not mean to say that Tyndall, Faraday, or Carpenter are "flimsy" people; for their activities and their knowledge the world is their debtor. But saying by implication, falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, with the array of intelligent as well as multitudinous testimony on the side of facts on the point in question, their remarks were "flimsy," and a reflection on their peers, whose positive testimony was entitled to qualify or silence theirs.

Professor Lardner teaching, by statistics and figures, the impossibility of a steamship crossing the Atlantic, at the very moment that the first Cunard steamer was entering port after a safe voyage, and other mistakes in the best-regulated scientific circles, should teach modesty; and science is modest, except when it forgets that it is a "mere baby," as you truly say. I wish the famous men your correspondent quoted ("whose testimony is of so much greater value than the weak-minded women and men who usually assembled on these occasions")—which is all true, if they had dealt as fairly with the subject as the other famous men have that I have introduced as rebutting evidence) had said something like this: "In the few opportunities I have had of investigating this subject, I think the communications were very trifling, and the raps and other manifestations could have been easily accounted for, and some of them I know were fraudulent. I have nothing to say about the subject in its wholeness; it would not be becoming in me to condemn the whole thing, which has the indorsement of many cultivated and scientific minds. I do not feel drawn to the subject by the little experience I have had, and my time, I think, would be more profitably or usefully spent in matters that seem to be more within the scope of scientific observation." Some such a conclusion as this, it strikes me, would have been more in keeping with the spirit of science. I cannot help feeling that they did not so speak, and that the added slur was the tribute which even greatness will pay to fashion, where it can be done without much risk.

Now, my dear editor, let me say through you to the public that I have no intention, in my remarks, of endorsing the bulk of so-called spiritual manifestations, as being either honest or spiritual; or of saying that they are not under any circumstances, as Falstaff would say, "an ocean of sack for a little bread." I am not surprised when people leave the "diggings" on account of the poor yield. It is only the fact stated by your correspondent, "the transcendent importance of the subject," that justifies "so much wading through slaughter to a throne"; but it is the throne that the heart of man to-day longs for, and the "transcendent" truth is in this (if you choose) mountain of rubbish of spiritual manifestations. Those who have found the nugget say that it pays for all the sluicing.

Let me say in all soberness, and as seriously as I can tell the truth, that I know and have witnessed, times without number, at least many times, at home and abroad, at accidental gatherings and planned gatherings, by unpaid mediums and in social life, the medium not belonging to spiritual circles, these manifestations. I have heard intelligent raps on a table, have seen a table and other things intelligently move without any living body or thing in contact with said tables or things. I know of no possible thing in my experience that I can state more truthfully than I can state these facts which I refer to, and which your correspondent says are "no facts." And just as surely do I know that the intelligence was disembodied, supermundane, not a mental boomerang. With my experience, it would be puerile and stultifying not to say it is what it claims to be, the living spirit of a person whose body lies under the sod. If I know anything for certain, I know that; and the belief is forced upon me by the evidence of my senses and the logic of common sense.

I think, Mr. Editor, you will give me the credit both of the desire and the ability to tell the truth; that I am no hallucinated fool. You may ask State Street: this I say to your correspondent, and the reader to whom I am a stranger. The few who know me know a statement of mine can be relied upon. That I am no man of straw, or irresponsible, I could give you the testimony of names, scientific, scholarly, and theological. If Theodore Parker were alive, he would say of me, "You can rely upon what he says." Wendell Phillips, who is alive, will say I am entitled to credit when I make a statement. I can name others; I have only a neighborhood reputation; so, unasked, I use the name I have, because it is cosmopolitan in reputation, and not that of a Spiritualist. When I say there have been raps and movements connected with ponderable bodies, unaided by human touch or device, and that said raps and movements have conveyed disembodied intelligence, I want the reader to believe I am stating the truth; not that I think I am, but that I know I am. I am not basing it on your experience, or any reports, but on my own experience; and I am no man's and no spirit's fool.

Of all the solutions offered from devil to cheat, if any one covered the ground of my experience, I would pause before adopting the spiritual one; but the one I have adopted is the only one that holds water, and I am inclined to think the only one that ever will. My article is getting rather long; I ought to say something on the reasonableness of this proof, and on the line of your correspondent's argument; but I must defer it for another article, unless you feel that you have been quite civil enough to me and to the subject in printing what I have already written.

JOHN WETHERBEE.

[Mr. Wetherbee's reputation for veracity is certainly beyond the least breath of suspicion, and no one would venture to question it for a moment. But shall we point out that, in the last paragraph but one, he testifies to mingled observations and inferences, when only observations can be testified to? Inferences are not subjects for testimony at all. That he heard the raps and saw the movements, is unquestionable; that they were produced by "disembodied intelligence," is simply his inference, and not "knowledge" that he can require others to accept as such on pain of discrediting his veracity. Mr. Wetherbee's word proves the raps and the movements; but it cannot prove the theory by which he accounts for them. We believe his word implicitly; but we do not believe his theory, and he will pardon us for suggesting that he should not seek to bind us to believe the latter, or else be guilty of the great injustice and discourtesy of doubting his truthfulness.—ED.]

FREEDOM TRAMPLED UNDER FOOT.

NEW YORK, March 1, 1875.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Dear Sir,—If anything will make Liberals realize the necessity for earnest action, the following from a late paper certainly will. I quote:—

"RALEIGH, N. C., Feb. 25.—The House of Representatives in three night-sessions considered a resolution of expulsion of J. W. Thorne, member from Warren County, on account of his non-belief in the existence of God, as set forth in a pamphlet issued by him. A vote was taken on the resolution at 12 o'clock last night, and resulted—Yeas, 46; Nays, 31. The resolution reads as follows:—

"WHEREAS, J. W. Thorne, the member from Warren County, has advocated and promulgated a most blasphemous doctrine, subversive of the principles of the Constitution of North Carolina and of sound morality; therefore,

"Resolved, That the said J. W. Thorne be, and he is hereby, expelled from a seat on this floor."

"Mr. Thorne is from Chester County, Penn., and is about sixty-five years old. The resolution was offered by Hanson Hughes, colored Representative from Granville."

If at this late day the people of a county in any State are to be deprived of the privilege and right to send a man to the Legislature because he does not believe in God, it surely is time for Liberals to wake up. No doubt the "good" people of North Carolina will say that the member from Warren County is as bad as his ideas are hurtful; but so far as the information contained above goes, his only fault is that he is an Atheist. That is one step; the next will be that none but Evangelical Christians may serve in the councils of the State or nation. Meantime all honor to the thirty-one among the seventy-seven members who voted against this religious test. And now the question to Liberals is: Are we alive to the plain issue here presented between the Church and freedom? "A."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
 PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

NOTICE TO THE LIBERAL PUBLIC.

M. ALTMAN & Co., }
301 & 303 6th Ave., N.Y. }

I have during the last six years kept my name and business constantly before the readers of Liberal papers, and have during that time supplied most of them with merchandise from my establishment, orders in most cases coming through the advertisements published by me.

But the limited space necessarily occupied in a newspaper makes it impossible to enumerate or specify accurately the many articles required by the public, and I have been, and still am, in receipt of many letters begging for a more detailed Price List or Catalogue. I have determined to issue the most complete Price List of Dry Goods, Fancy Goods, Ladies' and Gents' Undergarments and Outfits, Suits, Costumes, Hosiery, Gloves, and the thousand small articles in Millinery, Notions, and Haberdashery, that has ever been circulated, free of cost, to all who may send stamp and address. The matter is now in the hands of the printer, and by the time this is read will be ready to mail. Send on your addresses, with stamp for return postage. Liberals who may not be able, or who hesitate to send stamp, may simply send their address, and I will mail a few for distribution among their friends.

Fraternally yours,

MORRIS ALTMAN.

REASONS FOR USING THE EUREKA SPOOL SILK.
It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THEODORE PARKER:
A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES FOR 1875.

The Committee of the Free Religious Association, in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons, again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below,—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, undimly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF —.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in:—

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THE UNITED STATES are to have a Cardinal. Archbishop McCloskey is to have the red hat.

THE CATHOLICS claim between seven and eight millions of members for the Church in this country.

IT IS SAID that Cardinal Hohenlohe is Bismarck's candidate for the next Pope, in order to annul the Vatican Decrees of 1870 and get his own politico-religious legislation recognized.

THE announcement of a "Presbyterian Cook-Book" brought to the Independent an inquiry whether it contained a picture of "Calvin cooking Servetus," as it would be quite incomplete without this "historic roast."

MR. J. W. PIKE writes us to say that it was for other reasons than objections to any theoretical views that he declined, like Prof. Denton, to speak on the same platform with one of the speakers announced at the Paine Hall dedication. As we have before referred to the action of Mr. Pike and Prof. Denton in this matter under a misapprehension of facts, it is a simple matter of justice to state this explanation.

A CONVENTION of the Christianizers of the Constitution was held at Columbus, Ohio, on March 11. Similar conventions are held very frequently. The pertinacity of these devotees is marvellous; and their enthusiasm may prove contagious by and by, when events happen to favor their purpose. Their prayers are addressed to the American people, and they expect to be heard for their "much speaking."

WE ARE NOT often guilty of a mixed metaphor; but we ought to be well laughed at for the sentence—"shall the world never get rid," etc.—at the close of the last paragraph but two in our leader of last week. Our only excuse is that the sentence was written in the "small hours" of the morning, when even dormitat Homerus, and it unaccountably escaped correction in the proof. It would have been wiser in this case, if we had obeyed the Scripture injunction to "prove all things."

A RHODE ISLAND correspondent writes: "Besides the Free Religious Society there is another free-thought organization in Providence,—the Berean Society. It has existed for eighteen years, holding meetings for free discussion at 10.30 A.M., and 2.30 P.M., every Sunday. A considerable number of its members are also in union with the Free Religious Society. The fact that it is comparatively unknown is due, not to its insignificance, but to the 'mighty power in leaving out' all mention of it by the local press, on account of its unsavory radicalism. There are numerous other unheard-of radical societies, no doubt, in various parts of the country. Of all of these how important to have statistics! The showing would doubtless stimulate to a realization of Mr. Voysey's idea, some months ago expressed, of such a union as would afford encouragement and support, first, to each other, next, to the persons in the church intellectually in sympathy with rationalism, but who hesitate to risk their support by open alliance with it."

THE Christian Union thus refers to a most valuable document which was republished in THE INDEX of May 7, 1874: "The report of Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins, Chairman of the Committee on Education of the New York City Council of Political Reform, showing what has been accomplished by the Committee during the past year, deserves the attention of all good citizens. Mr. Hawkins has labored indefatigably, and, we are glad to say, successfully, to secure in this and some other States the enactment of laws to compel the education of every child. In Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Michigan, Kansas, California, and Nevada, such laws now exist, and the example of those States we hope will be generally and speedily followed by the rest. The importance of the subject will be seen when it is remembered that a careful analysis of the census of the United States discloses the fact that on the average in this country illiterate persons produce thirty times as many paupers, and commit ten times as many crimes, according to their numbers, as those not illiterate. This fact speaks trumpet-tongued for the system of compulsory education."

MR. DAMON Y. KILGORE, writing under date of March 10, says: "Three weeks ago we formed a Liberal League in Philadelphia, and now have over sixty members. The officers are as follows: Isaac Rhen, President; Mary Pratt, Vice-President; Carrie S. Burnham, Secretary; Caroline H. Spear, Treasurer; Damon Y. Kilgore, Franklin Skinner, John M. Spear, Executive Committee. We hold meetings every Sunday at 2.30 P.M., and have a large attendance. The first speaker opens and closes the debate, and is allowed thirty minutes. All other speakers are restricted to ten minutes each. Would it not be wise to call a National Convention of Leagues, to make provision for a grand Congress of emancipated souls here during the Centennial from all parts of the world? Authority is marshalling his forces; why not Freedom begin to organize hers? Freedom, like truth, is feminine; and you will note a large proportion of our officers are women." In response to this suggestion, we would say that, if a sufficient number of Liberal Leagues should vote explicitly to authorize us to issue a call for such a Convention, and also pledge themselves to take part in it by sending delegates, we should be very glad to obey their instructions, without which we could not with propriety take the initiative. No doubt the announcement of such a Convention would give a great and immediate stimulus to the formation of new Leagues all over the country. Is there enough courage and zeal to carry out this plan?

THE "Report of the New York City Council of Political Reform for the Years 1872, 1873, and 1874," has just been published. It appears that this Council was organized in the Spring of 1870, in order to break down the Tammany Ring. It is a permanent organization devoted to the suppression of corruption in all its hydra-headed forms. In 1870, it exposed the great abuse of the appropriation of public money to sectarian institutions in New York, amounting to over $1,000,000 annually, and has put an effectual stopper upon it by Constitutional amendment. It started and carried through the reform movement which destroyed the infamous Ring. It has materially reduced taxation and saved the city and county from the payment of over $10,000,000 of fraudulent claims. It has lessened to a great degree the corruptions of legislative jobbery, fraudulent elections, police court maladministration, official malfeasance, and has accomplished many other vital reforms. In all this work, Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins (whose lecture in this number of THE INDEX is commended to the closest attention of our readers) is credited in this Report by the President and Secretary of the Council with having taken a chief part in the suppression of sectarian appropriations, the prevention of gratuities to railroads (amounting in New York City alone to over $10,000,000), and the passage of the Compulsory Education law not only in New York, but also in New Jersey, Kansas, Nevada, and California. His report on the latter subject, republished in THE INDEX of May 7, 1874, had a circulation of over 2,000,000 copies, and an influence almost unparalleled. Surely such a record entitles him to the gratitude of the whole country. He has most nobly discharged the duties of a patriotic citizen, at a time when patriotism must show itself in the arduous toils of the reformer in civic affairs.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

Our Sick Man, and How to Cure Him;

OR, THE EDUCATIONAL PROBLEM IN THE COTTON STATES.

EIGHTH LECTURE IN THE SEVENTH COURSE OF SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES, DELIVERED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, BOSTON, MARCH 7, 1875.

BY DEXTER A. HAWKINS,

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION OF THE NEW YORK CITY COUNCIL OF POLITICAL REFORM.

The fortunate geographical position of the United States, with no powerful neighbors to encroach upon our borders or disturb the public peace, happily frees us from the malign influences of pressure from without that weigh down and distract other nations. We are freed from the study of many complicated external questions that engage a great share of their public talent and treasure, and are enabled to give our whole attention and means to our own internal affairs. But we are still mortal. In every nation, at frequent periods, some province is disturbed, or State disaffected; the government and the people, or some portion of them, are not in accord.

The institutions are not suited to the genius, the inborn character, of the inhabitants, or they require a higher or a lower degree of cultivation and enlightenment than actually exists. If this discord and unfitness is general—pervades the whole community,—the government is a failure, and a change inevitable; for every nation in the long run obtains, and must obtain, that form of government, and method of administration, best suited to its necessities; as certainly as in the world of matter, water finds its level.

One race is submissive, obedient, ignorant, and inert; they enjoy and thrive under a paternal but intelligent despotism. The Egyptians are an example of long standing of this class.

Another is self-willed, reliant, enlightened, and active; they can endure only a republic. The New Englanders (Yankees) may be taken as a type of this class.

When the lack of harmony between people and government is not general but local, the discordant locality may be likened to a diseased member of the human body, or a sick man in the community.

Every nation and country has its sick man, and will continue to have so long as humanity is imperfect; hence his presence is no cause of national discouragement, but rather a perpetual and ever-present stimulus to improvement and development. The study, care, and cure of the disease benefits alike doctor, nurse, and patient.

The Garden of Eden was favored with one of these blessings in disguise, and he is not fully restored to moral health yet; though he has doubtless improved intellectually since he ate of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, and some say morally also; for, according to the statistics of crime, the percentage of fratricides has greatly decreased since the time of Cain.

In the days of Noah the sick man formed the majority of the human race, and seemed to be in so bad a way that the only method of cure finally adopted was to drown him out. This was perhaps the origin of hydropathy.

The Hebrews were often afflicted with a national invalid; and, according to the Old Testament and Josephus, they were cured of him by being sent into captivity till the disorders that troubled the body politic were purged out by adversity.

In the days of Rehoboam, the sick man, though a minority of the population, consisted of ten tribes. He seceded; and, after maintaining a vicious and disturbed existence for two hundred and sixty years, was cured by being swallowed up by his more healthful and vigorous Pagan neighbors, and disappeared utterly and forever from the pages of history.

The remaining two tribes preserved their national existence for eight centuries longer, when the disease of ignorance, corruption, prejudice, and moral blindness seems to have so thoroughly permeated their whole system that their extinction as a nation was inevitable.

Every nation in Europe has had its sick man, and the medicine for two thousand years regularly administered was force. This may repress the disease for the time, but does not cure it. It is sure to break out again in some other and more violent form.

The Christian Church used it with great vigor for centuries, against what it called error or heresy; and the result was, first, the division of the Church into two bodies, the Eastern and the Western Church; second, the subdivision of the latter into the Romish and the Protestant Churches; and, third, the entire separation in our government of Church and State, so as to make further use of force here by the great moral power of the world impossible.

The Mohammedans applied it with rigor against what they considered moral and political disease, until they themselves at the beginning of this century became the sick man of Europe. They now are resorting to moral remedies, such as schools, toleration, internal improvements, and modern inventions; and the happy result of this change of medicine is seen in the fact that their hold on the Bosphorus, half a century ago nearly relaxed, now bids fair to be permanent.

At the close of the Revolutionary war we had an invalid in the guise of "Articles of Confederation," devised in 1778, not adopted by all the States till 1781, and in 1787, only six years thereafter, found to be so weak and unsuited to our condition, that on February 21st of that year Congress officially proclaimed its inability to conduct the government as then constituted.

According to the long-established system of political hygiene, the medicines for our patient then were, first, anarchy, confusion, and bloodshed; second, a temporary dictator; and, finally, a permanent king or emperor backed by a large army. But our people, contrary to precedent and authority, resorted only to moral remedies. They turned a calm and scrutinizing eye upon themselves, when apprized by Congress that the wheels of government had stopped, they carefully examined the extent and cause of the evil, and patiently waited two whole years till a remedy was discovered: to wit, a strong National Constitution; which they voluntarily adopted without having wrung a tear or drop of blood from mankind.

The Republics of Rome, Italy, France, and Spain never pursued this course; it was not possible for them, from the social, intellectual, and moral condition of the mass of their people; hence their ruin.

Our country in its colonial days, through the avarice of one race, and the helplessness and barbarism of another, inherited a disease almost as bad as the scrofula, for its seat was supposed at first to be in the blood: to wit, negro slavery. But the gradual whitening out of the slaves reduced it to colored slavery, and suggested at last to its warmest advocates that even color was not essential; that slaves might be of any hue; and white slaves came to be more highly prized than black.

This disease fifteen years ago threw the patient into a delirium of the most violent and dangerous character. Hydropathy had no effect upon him; sedatives and preventives, in the shape of compromise plasters, had been applied in 1820, 1832, and 1850, and finally in 1856 the Supreme Court plaster known as the Dred Scott Decision, till all such nostrums ceased to pacify him, and at last he made a violent and fratricidal attack upon the rest of the family.

The only cure left was an extensive and long-continued operation of phlebotomy. This old-fashioned remedy brought the patient out of delirium, quieted his nerves, and restored his reason; but it left him in a condition of great prostration, physical and moral, and exposed to attacks of other maladies.

Let us now diagnose his condition, and see if we cannot, like our fathers in 1787, discover a tonic that may be voluntarily taken, and will restore the patient to the fullest measure and use of all the powers of his being; and one, too, that will not wring a tear or a drop of blood from humanity.

The nine cotton States, namely, North and South Carolina, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas, contain a population, over ten years of age, of a little more than 5,000,000; of whom 51 per cent., or 2,555,751, cannot read and write. The inhabitants of these nine States, over twenty-one years of age, number 3,070,000, of whom 51 per cent., or 1,572,101 cannot read and write. It is a striking but encouraging fact that the percentage of illiteracy over twenty-one is greater than the percentage over ten years of age.

It shows that the tide of ignorance was highest ten years ago, and has been slowly ebbing ever since: the children now living between the ages of ten and twenty-one are far more intelligent than those of the previous decade. Their whole population is 6,887,475; of whom 56 per cent., or 3,896,320, are white, and 43 per cent., or 2,991,155, are colored, and came out of bondage.

All, both white and colored, were brought up in a state of society that considered labor degrading,—the occupation of slaves. The 56 per cent. of whites grew up under a system of caste that had of necessity to make might right, and to hold a white skin to be a sort of patent of nobility, a proof of hereditary and indefeasible right to rule.

Their whole industrial system was one of force; and their political management and regard for the political rights of opponents were, to a great extent, controlled by the same brute principle.

Their governments had been nominally republican, but really most tyrannical and despotic oligarchies. Each had been of necessity intolerant and truculent in its administration, for the reason that it was obliged, at whatever cost of feeling or humanity, to sustain and protect human slavery. The education and habits of the citizens were dominated and distorted by the exigencies of their system of forced labor.

This system and any government based upon human rights were in perpetual and irreconcilable antagonism. They could not permanently exist together. One or the other must go under. The mass of our people did not think so; but our wise men, Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Garrison, Phillips, Sumner, Seward, and Lincoln did, as well as many intelligent foreigners. While travelling in Italy, in 1853, I had for a companion for some weeks a gentleman from Moscow, who was a member of the Diplomatic Service of Russia. He spoke seven languages, and, though he had never been in America, he was as familiar as De Tocqueville with our history and institutions. One day he surprised me by saying, somewhat abruptly: "How long do you think your free government will stand?" I replied: "As long as any government stands; we think it the best, and the best of every species survives."

He replied: "I give you ten years. Half of your country is fit for a republic. In that half the intelligent citizen, the school district, the town, the county, the State, the free church, are all homogeneous, qualified and harmonious elements of free government. But the other half of your country has an institution and a social organism, which unfit every citizen for a republic, and train him up for a military despotism. At the rate things progress and develop in America, the crisis must come within ten years; and then the result will depend upon whether there is in the free States intelligence and decision enough to crush out slavery; if not, free government will end. The Union will be preserved, but either as a military despotism protecting slavery, or a democratic republic abolishing slavery, and protecting the free common schools and a free church."

The crisis did come in eight years. After a century of experiment, the cotton States decided to sacrifice free government for the sake of retaining forced labor. They expended half a million of lives and billions of money in the endeavor to establish a political power in harmony with human slavery, and with it as a corner-stone.

Their acts, method of thought, and aspirations during the five years of bloody struggle had rendered them more unfit than before to carry on successfully and wisely the free and tolerant government they had failed to destroy; namely, a democratic republic based upon universal suffrage.

When peace was restored, it was thought to be clear that it was not wise or safe to intrust this 56 per cent. of born and bred petty tyrants and oligarchists with the whole political power of the cotton States. They would naturally try to restore in substance, if not in form, the old order of things, and would do it inevitably if not restrained by some superior power.

But the 43 per cent. of colored inhabitants just out of bondage were equally unfit to rule a republican State, though from an opposite standpoint. They were grossly ignorant, and had been brought up to consider themselves human cattle—mere chattels,—with no rights except to labor and to obey. The gates of knowledge, especially of political knowledge, had been kept guarded and shut against them.

It had been a crime to teach them even the alphabet. They lacked self-reliance; and had small capacity for organization and systematic, thoughtful, independent action. They were like vines that had been remorselessly cropped, and pruned, and twisted, and trained to their supports. These supports were suddenly removed, and each vine was required to be a tree.

Their moral sense was not developed, except what naturally, and in spite of wrong discipline, flows from a kind heart; rather it was, so far as possible, distorted or extinguished.

Petty thieving, lying, dishonesty, and deception had been a necessity of their daily lives. Now they are placed in position of responsibility and danger, requiring virtue, and intelligence, and long experience.

Is it strange, then, brought up as they were, that a colored member of the Louisiana Legislature this winter who sold his vote for fifty dollars should think that he had done both wisely and well; and should exclaim, with evident satisfaction, while exhibiting the money, "This child has often been sold before, but this is the first time that he ever got the pay himself?"

But little assistance, evidently, could at first be derived or expected from the wisdom or experience of this 43 per cent. They were wards of the nation; grown-up children that must be protected and educated into real manhood.

In crushing out the rebellion, we put an end to the former civil and social State; destroyed the oligarchy, abolished human cattle, and made all human beings equal before the law.

But we did not and could not eradicate at once the evil effects, upon all classes, of two hundred years of slavery. These remain till new generations are born and trained under the ægis of liberty.

Through a political necessity we ushered them all at once, late oligarchists and late human cattle, into the temple of democratic-republican freedom, and gave each of them the same powers and rights that we possess.

The Constitution of the United States requires us to guarantee to each State a republican form of government. But for individual happiness and national prosperity the substance is of more value than the form; and the substance depends upon the character and capacity of the citizen.

A majority of the adults, both white and colored—51 per cent.—were wholly unfit to possess the right of suffrage. They could not read the ballots they were called upon to cast.

Rome was a republic in form, while a military despotism in substance. Spain has of late had a republic in form; but an ignorant Spanish population, though called citizens, are wholly unequal to the duties of citizenship, and are only fit to be what they have become,—subjects of Alfonso, or slaves of Don Carlos.

What now is the actual condition of our patient as a member of our democratic-republican family? He has full civil and political rights; but 51 per cent. of him above the age of ten cannot read and write, and is as ignorant of the use of these rights as a child is of the use of a case of surgical instruments. If we give the instruments to him, and leave him without a guardian, he is as likely to cut, and probe, and saw in the wrong place as in the right, and thus destroy himself. So it is with one-half of our patient. What we intended for his salvation may, through his ignorance and inexperience, prove his destruction.

The remaining 49 per cent. of him has been accustomed to use these rights (these surgical instruments, so to speak) under an oligarchy for the aggrandizement of his own caste, and oppression of the other caste. Naturally and logically he will continue to use his powers for the same ends, if permitted.

The current of human action flows on like that of a river in the old and familiar channel, however tortuous and full of rocks, until a new one is made for it. One-half of the volume of this great stream of humanity prefer the old channel. The other half, conscious that it leads to a cataract, resist; but are not sufficiently instructed or powerful to direct the stream to the new channel. What is the inevitable, immediate outcome from this state of affairs?

Some of our people think the cotton States have done badly, and point to the fact that their finances are swamped, industry depressed, public improvements stopped, their elections a farce or a tragedy.

A more just opinion is that, on the whole, they have done a great deal better than we have had a right, or any reasonable grounds, to expect.

Would you expect the crew of a sailing packet to make no mistakes on the first voyage in managing a steamer? especially if half the crew were mere dock laborers, and had never been to sea at all in any craft? The sea most afflicted with ever-changing shoals and quicksands, sunken rocks and breakers, is the politics and legislation of a great and growing State; especially so if society is in a condition of transition and formation.

The most difficult ship to manage is the ship of State; the most intricate and troublesome piece of machinery to keep in perfect running order is the machinery of human government.

Statesmen in all ages have endeavored to keep this machinery in skilled hands. Philosophers have taught the necessity of intelligence, wisdom, and experience, in rulers.

Lycurgus compelled the education of every citizen of Sparta. Solon made the education of all citizens of Athens obligatory. Charlemagne established schools, and required the children of all courtiers to attend, so that political power might be in cultivated and skilled hands.

In the simplest form of government—military despotism—the officers before obtaining commands submit to a careful training and discipline.

The Chinese system of government, so far as we know, is based wholly on intelligence. Confucius and Mencius so taught, and it seems to have been the practice there long before their period. The ignorant in China have no voice whatever in the government, and have not had for several thousand years. As a consequence, the Chinese have endured longer as an independent nation than any other people recorded in history. They govern a larger population, and sustain more human beings to the square mile, and are held up as models of perseverance, industry, and economy. This demonstrates the intelligence and wisdom of those who have ruled.

France, in 1795, established the republic and universal suffrage. But the majority were illiterate, and the republic soon became a military despotism. She did the same thing again in 1848; but even then more than half of her citizens could not read the ballots they put in the urns. In fourteen years this illiterate mass voted for a military despot. I attended the election at Paris and at Rouen, in 1852, for two days, and by conversing with the voters learned that they had no clear conception of what they were doing.

Spain has just gone through a similar farcical and tragical experience. The Spanish republics in America fifty years ago committed a like mistake, and have enjoyed neither domestic peace nor prosperity since. Their normal condition is one of revolution; and will be, till power gets into intelligent hands, and the form of government is in harmony with the conditions and necessities of the governed.

Conservative and staid England extends the ballot, but extends education with it. A distinguished liberal said in the last Parliament to the more advanced wing of his party: "You demand universal suffrage; I demand universal education to go with it."

It is an axiom in political science that intelligence in the rulers is essential to good government. And the larger the country, and the more varied and complicated the interests, the higher is the degree of intelligence required of the citizen. In our system every voter is a ruler, a sovereign. In any city or State, where a body of voters sufficiently large to hold the balance of power is ignorant or corrupt; this bad or dangerous element at frequent periods will control the whole government, and reduce the elections, the laws, and the administration to its own level. We have passed through this experience in New York city, at a cost of fifty millions of dollars, and riotous and fraudulent elections, and much bad legislation; and are now guarding against its recurrence by compulsory education.

In the cotton States more than one-half of the adults are ignorant or corrupt, and, being the majority, they not only hold the balance of power, but they hold the power itself. An unscrupulous and intelligent leader is never wanting to control such a mass, and to wield it for purposes anything but patriotic or honest. The history of every country shows this. This law of human action is universal. Our States and our age, as well as other countries and other ages, are subject to it.

A political necessity induced us to put the cotton States into the power of ignorance and degradation by proclaiming universal suffrage; and a political necessity of a very grave character will compel us to help them out.

At the end of the Rebellion, when the reorganization of the South came up, one of our most patriotic and sagacious statesmen, the late Governor Andrew, remarked to a committee in New York in consultation on this very subject, that it was useless to reorganize the South by its fall; it must, to be successful, be reorganized by its head. This, rightly understood, is the key to the solution of the difficulty. It is the thread of Ariadne that, if followed, will guide us out of the otherwise fatal labyrinth.

At the time the late Emperor Napoleon was President of France, he published a little book called Napoleonic Ideas. The gist of it was that a democracy with universal suffrage, to secure public order and prosperity, necessarily and logically culminated in electing an emperor for life. From the standpoint of ignorant suffrage, like that of France in 1802 or 1852, he was doubtless correct; and some of the cotton States would to-day probably prefer an enlightened dictator for life to the confusion, corruption, imbecility, and uncertainty that pervade every department of their governments. The worst possible condition of society is anarchy, and democracy based upon ignorant suffrage might justly be called, if such a thing were possible, organized anarchy. It was necessary for his self-protection to give the ballot to the freedman, however ignorant. It is a weapon more effective for defence in a free State than the bayonet. His impulses are right, and he will make no worse use of it than the equally unlettered poor white.

But the South must be saved from the unlettered of both classes. In short, it must be redeemed from the rule of ignorance. This cannot be done at once by restricting suffrage to the intelligent; for, as a matter of fact, a right like that of suffrage, once conferred upon millions of men, cannot be peaceably taken away. Nor would it be wise at present to do so, even if it were practicable; for the 49 per cent. of the present generation in the cotton States, who are not illiterate, are, as already shown, not themselves qualified to govern with justice and equity a republican State, peopled to the extent of nearly one-half by their former slaves. The three thousand unpunished murders, stated by a Southern member of Congress to have been committed by them since civil government was restored, are proof of this. The political slaughters of New Orleans, Coushatta, and Colfax demonstrate it.

The redemption and restoration of the cotton States can be accomplished only by and through universal education. Dictators, military governors, martial law, cure nothing, remedy nothing; they are mere temporary restraints, like the hangman's rope or the headman's axe; often necessary evils, but never reformatory elements. Compromises to keep the Kelloggs or the McEnerys in power are equally futile.

The free common school must be planted, nurtured, and sustained within reach of every man's children, white or colored, from Albemarle Sound to the Rio Grande; and a law must be enacted, and public sentiment to enforce it created, that will require the children to attend these schools. In the language of Milton, statesman as well as poet: "To make the people fittest to choose, and the chosen fittest to govern, we must teach the people." The patience and perseverance of long years are essential to success in this undertaking.

We must labor and wait, till the present generation, at least, has passed away, and a new one has been born and educated in freedom, common schools, and equal civil rights. It is a great work, a gigantic labor, to create the schools and educate in them seven millions of people.

The very inertia of the ignorance to be overcome is enormous; to say nothing of prejudice, which now is so great in some localities as to compel the teacher, like the early apostles of Christianity, to carry his life in his hands, even while going about on his errand of mercy and enlightenment, doing only good.

But it is a work that must be accomplished; there is no escape from it. We shall suffer till we do it. It is, as it were, a decree of Divine Providence.

The existence of our free institutions depends upon it; and we believe that Providence has decreed that they shall not go down; the future of humanity requires their preservation. The army had no success in putting down the rebellion till the President ordered emancipation. This removed the cause of war, and made, under the immutable laws of God, success both possible and right; before that, it was both impossible and wrong.

If the cotton States remain in the present condition of ignorance, and prejudice, and chronic discontent, they menace and corrupt the whole fabric of republican government, here as well as there. The necessity of the constant interference of the military to preserve the peace is introducing a new and destructive element into our civil polity,—an element that leads inevitably to only one end, a military government for the whole country. It matters little which party holds the power in the cotton States; the sword must be invoked to perform what the olive branch and the scales of justice ought to accomplish, but fail; and this will continue till the school-master works out the slow but sure regeneration of the people.

The panacea—perhaps we should say the specific,—for the political ills of the reconstructed States is just that which made Massachusetts colony the cradle and nursery of American liberty and democracy,—the district school; and through that the instruction and development of the understanding and conscience of each citizen.
